PETER ARE SMITH'S FORECAST.

Weather Prognosticator of West Virginia Records His Guesses.

For a number of years this paper has been publishing the weather predictions of a prominent St. Louis (Mo.) weather prophet. By comparison we find those made by our old friend Peter Are Smith, town weighmaster, corn remedy manufacturer and ex-hotel keeper of Kingwood, West Va., are just as reliable as those of his co-laborer of St. Louis. Hereafter we shall give Mr. Smith's forecasts precedence, as they come to us before the ink is dry and are accurate. His weather guesses for January are as follows and so far they have hit the nail, not on the head, but a glancing blow:

The new year is likely to open its eyes on this end of the continent clear of a storm wave, the last disturbance of the year having passed beyond the Atlantic coast, leaving a crisp bracing atmosphere. About the 2d or 3d the wind will get around to the east and south, developing more storm conditions which will center on the 4th or 5th in its passage across the continent and will be on transit to about the 7th or 8th inclusive of the sections of the country over which it passes. Southward rain in central parts, rain and snow in the north and central west sleet, snow and blizzards. A cold wave will follow the path of the disturbance which will reach far southward. On or touching the 10th the wind will change to the east and south and the temperature becoming much warmer terminating in cloudiness, rain and snow squalls, attended by very disagreeable winds on or touching the 13th. On the 14th new moon and at an eclipse node. A cold wave will follow on the 14th. The temperature will change about the 16th growing warmer; cloudiness will merge into rain or snow about the 18th or 19th reaching most parts of the country in some element of disturbance which will be followed by a cold wave at the close of the rain and snow on or touching the 20th. The 23d and 24th snow squalls, perhaps rain in the south, and a quick change to cold will follow. The last storm period centers on the 28th or 29th of the month. On the 26th or 27th the temperature will change to warmer, then cloudiness followed by rain or snow which will be attended in the north by blizzards. The cold wave following will reach down south decidely very far. February is likely to have one, if not two or three, very intense storms, followed by a very quick cold wave, merging from a thunder storm into a blizzard.

Calendars Received.

This office acknowledges the receipt of handsome and useful calendars for the year 1907 from the Garrett National Bank and D. E. Bolden, of Oakland, and the Lonaconing Savings Bank, at Lonaconing, Md.

RYAN'S GLADE.

Not seeing any items in your valuable paper from this section for some time, I will jot a few which perhaps will be of interest to some of your many readers.

We are having nice weather for January but roads are very muddy, owing to heavy rains recently.

Mrs. W. B. Harvey has been visiting her daughter at Wallman the past few days.

Mr. Charles Thompson was so unfortunate as to get his thumb broken New Year's Day.

Mrs. Jesse King has been on the sick list for some time with dropsy.

There was a "wood chopping" at Mr. John G. Riley's New Year's Day with quite a number present.

Our Grange is progressing very nicely in their new hall at Kearney.

A pretty home wedding was solemnized in our community New Year's Day at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Hester Harvey, the parties being her daughter Ursula and Mr. John McIntire, of near Lonaconing, Rev. E. P. Idleman officiating. Miss Nellie Harring was bridesmaid and Mr. Osborne Harvey was best man. Among those present were Mrs. E. W. Kelso, Mrs. M. S. Harvey, Mr. and Mrs. J. M. White, Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Riley, Mr. Elmer Harvey, Miss Ida Harvey, Miss Anna Steyer, Mrs. T. K. Harvey. Their many friends wish them a long and happy life.

Mr. Henry White and wife are contemplating moving to Kearney.

Mr. Guy Harvey and Miss Ida Harvey attended a festival at Mt. Lake Tuesday. On their return they reported a very enjoyable evening.

BLUE BELL.

Attention, Grangers.

Pomona Grange met at Painter School House Dec. 29th, 1906, and elected the following officers for the ensuing year: Master, J. M. Conneway; Overseer, Delphus Enlow; Lecturer, Wm. E. Bishoff; Stewart, Jas. D. Harvey; Assistant Stewart, C. A. Miller; Chaplain, James W. Wilson; Treasurer, Herman Steiding; Secretary, John R. Browning; Gate Keeper, Theo. George; Ceres, Mrs. J. M. Conneway; Pomona, Miss Mary Garrett; Flora, Mrs. Porter; Lady Stewart, Miss Anna Steiding.

The installation of officers will be at Deer Park on Saturday, Jan. 26th, 1907. All Grangers and especially the officers are requested to attend. Will give further notice later.

J. M. CONNEWAY, Master.
JOHN R. BRONWING, Sec'y.

Dividends Declared.

The Garrett National and the First National Banks of Oakland declared their usual semi-annual dividends payable on and after the first instant.

ONWARD TO THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. Charles E. Hoyes Writes From the Mid-Pacific to Home Friends.

To the Editor of The Republican.

Early on November 1st we wakened and found ourselves at Yuma, Arizona, and our train on the Southern Pacific Railroad was crossing the great Colorado river into the "Golden State," California.

The first things to attract our attention after turning out of our berths and hurriedly dressing, were the scattered grass huts of the Indians on the Yuma reservation and the dirty squaws and papooses themselves, who were coming out rubbing sleep from their eyes. Then our long overland train, pulled by the big oil burning engine, plunged into the desert again on its way to Los Angeles.

Nature has been kind to Southern California in many ways, but the land is crying for water, and men are rapidly supplying the best lands with the life giving fluid, thereby turning barren deserts into fields and orchards. You have probably read how one such attempt was overdone here as follows:

"Salton Sink" is a valley more than one hundred feet below sea level; in attempting to irrigate this valley, from the Colorado river, the whole river was unintentionally turned from its course into the "sink" and quickly formed a large lake or "sea" as it is called here. The few houses in the valley and the railroad tracks were submerged and a new road made on higher ground. A few days before our arrival the break in the river bank had been filled and the waters again turned toward the Gulf of California, but the waters of the new "Salton Sea" were lapping the railroad as we passed and spreading over the valley twenty or thirty miles. Within a few years this "sea" will have evaporated, and water brought from the Colorado, properly controlled, will have turned a sandy desert into a fertile valley, which will be divided into hundreds of small farms, orchards and town lots, in spite of the fact that the great Colorado is above it on the east and the Pacific on the west a hundred feet higher.

At 4 p. m., on the same day we arrived in the metropolis of Southern California, Los Angeles. The "City of the Angles," as its Spanish name signifies, is booming. Its population is now about 250,000, said to have increased 40,000 during the last year. At a recent election a strip of country from the city to the ocean was annexed, making it a seaport. The country around and from the city to the ocean is being divided into town lots. We passed thru one townsite, formerly a bean ranch, but now laid out in lots with streets, pavements, parks, but not a house yet. Real estate agents are as thick as bees and almost everything is for sale but prices are generally in the sky. A great future lies before the State: its climate is worth more than its gold.

Most of the people of this section have come from the middle west and eastern states, but there are emigrants from every country of Europe, and a few Mexicans, who cling to the language and religion taught their fathers by the Spanish missionaries before the stars and stripes were hoisted over our great southwest.

The writer spent two weeks in Pomona, a typical young California city, thirty miles east of Los Angeles. It lies in a broad valley at the foot of the Sierra Madre mountains. Oranges, lemons, English walnuts, pears, prunes, apricots, grapes, sugar beets, alfalfa, olives, etc., are raised; barley is raised on the hills during the rainy season without irrigation, but the orange groves are carefully irrigated with water from nearby mountain streams.

When we were there in November the oranges were beginning to ripen, roses blooming and the days warm—frequently 90 degrees—with cool nights, until the rains began to fall, when cool weather prevailed with a few frosty nights, but the flowers and oranges uninjured. While we were having almost summer weather in the valley, however, the mountains were covered with snow, forming a beautiful picture indeed.

The care bestowed upon the orchard here is astonishing. For example, the orange trees are planted in exact rows; they are watered by irrigation ditches every month, and after each irrigation the ground between rows is carefully raked over; fertilizer is sometimes applied while in some groves peas are raised between rows then plowed under; grass is not allowed and the ground is kept clean, mellow and moist; the trees are kept carefully trimmed and sprayed if attacked by insects. Some even cover their trees with canvas if frost threatens.

Orange groves cost in Pomona from $5,000 to $20,000 per acre. Unimproved fruit land with water rights $125 to $225 per acre; without water rights $100 less. Five room cottages rent for $8 to $15 per month; residence lots cost $200 to $1500.

The tendency here seems to be to divide the land into small farms; if a man owns and cultivates from five to ten acres of land he can make a good living for his family; then with good roads, telephones, churches and schools near, and daily mail he enjoys all the advantages of city life while living in the country.

Around the school houses in Pomona the writer saw hundreds of bicycles; most of the children even in the city live too far away to walk to school; the houses are so scattered that every one has a wheel to enable him to go to school, church or business.

In Los Angeles we spent several weeks very pleasantly with Mr. B. B. Savage and his sisters, former Garrett countians; they recently came from Spokane, Washington.

Dec. 4th we arrived in San Francisco and went immediately on board the U. S. Army Transport "Thomas," which will take us to Manila via Honolulu and Guam. San Francisco is still a city of ruins; its miles of blackened, roofless walls remind one of Pompeii. Most the streets are open; men are busily tearing down old walls while others are building new ones; sunken and tilted pavements are still silent witnesses to the severity of the earthquake. Wagons loaded with debris and others with building materials block the streets. Market street, formerly the business center, is now turned over to the wrecking companies and contractors. It will take years of work before San Francisco rises like Baltimore, grander than before; at present everything is hurry and confusion, but rise it will, because the greatest development in our country is on the Pacific coast and it will continue there until the Pacific coast rivals the Atlantic in population, wealth and commerce.

Promptly at noon Dec. 5th the handsome ship "Thomas" back away from Folsom street wharf and we began our long journey.

CHARLES E. HOYE.

At Sea, Dec. 12, 1906.

THE GLADES OF GARRETT.

[Bentztown Bard in the Baltimore Sun.]

Aye, the Highlands for their heather,
Killarney for its braes—
For me the glades of Garrett when the golden buckwheat sways,
When songbirds fill the forests and the sheep upon the hills
Go with little bells that tinkle to the tinkling of the rills;
The golden glades of Garrett where the hours are veiled in gleam
And the footsteps of the spirit walk in cloisters of the dream.

I have climbod the lovely summits, I have seen the blue mist lay
In the green lap of the mountains through the golden summer day;
I have seen it lift and lighten, I have seen it float and swing,
Like a veil that moves to dancing of the lithe, frail form of spring;
I have gazed down, wild with wonder,
o'er the green glades at my feet—
Oh, the golden glades of Garrett with the sheep bells tinkling sweet!

Buckwheat pastures, where the pirates of the blue, bee-litten main Seek the cargoes of the blossoms in the sunny polien rain;
Lordly plateaus, vast expanses, mountains grandly, greenly fair,
And the tonic and the balsam of the fragrant forest air—
Yes, the golden glades of Garrett are the Highlands counterpart,
Only sweeter, only bluer in the warm love of our hearts!

Lowing cattle, fairy meadows, flashing cascades, lost and found
In the shadow and the silence, in the tinkle and the sound;
White clouds stooping to the hilltops,
pine-clad peaks above the snows
All the rapture, all the wonder, all the charm of it I know—
Know these golden glades of Garrett, where bright shuttle, ray by ray,
Weave the web of wonder-beauty where the green glades stretch away!

Aye, the Highlands for their heather,
Killarney for its braes—
For me the glades of Garrett where the golden buckwheat sways;
Where the rovers in the clover on their honeyed wings go by
And you step right off the verges of the green hills to the sky,
The golden glades of Garrett—in my heart of hearts they gleam,
And I near the sheep bells tinkling to the tinkling of the stream!

STEPPED IN FRONT OF TRAIN.

L. Nye Duval Stuck and Killed in Baltimore Tuesday.

Mr. L. Nye Duval, 35 years old, son of the late George Washington Duval, of Prince George's county, and son-in-law of Capt. John M. Jarboe, of Oakland, was instantly killed at 1.30 o'clock Tuesday afternoon near Calverton station, Baltimore, by a train of the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad.

Mr. Duval was employed by the Atlantic and Pacific Tea Company as a salesman, having recently removed from his country home to that city. He was highly esteemed by his employers.

His wife, who was Miss Belle Jarboe, was in Oakland at the time of the death of her husband, but returned to Baltimore Tuesday night upon receipt of a telegram informing her of his death, being accompanied by her brother-in-law, Mr. Charles F. White of Hutton.

Last evening's Baltimore News contained the following with reference to the sad affair:

"How the accident came about is something of a mystery. Apparently all that is known of the death is the statement of Engineer R. B. Downs, who says that Mr. Duval was walking along the track at a point between Calverton Station and the Franklin-street bridge when the train, going about 50 miles an hour, bore down upon him. He says he blew his whistle some time before the train reached Mr. Duval, but that the train struck the man and threw the body some distance in front of the locomotive. The train was stopped and the body was taken to Union Station, where it was removed to the Morgue. At the Morgue it was identified by Mrs. J. B. Osborne."

Died.

DROEGE—'Squire Emil Fred Droege, at Deer Park, of liver trouble, at 6.30 p. m., Dec. 26, 1906, aged 69 years. Mr. Droege was born in Bremen, Germany, in 1837, and came to this country in 1856, landing in Baltimore. Two years later he came to Deer Park and for some time was engaged in the mercantile business. He served as Justice of the Peace for twenty years. He is survived by his widow, Mrs. Emily Droege, four sons, one daughter and six grandchildren to mourn their loss. It was our privilege to know Mr. Droege for nearly four years. We always found him good natured, gentlemanly and courteous. He was of a retired but kind disposition, honest, upright, intelligent and refined. He was a loving husband, indulgent father, a kind and helpful neighbor, ready to lend a helping hand but without ostentation. He was a friend of the church, a faithful attendant at regular services and at communion and an elder of St. Luke's Lutheran congregation at the time of his death. Farewell brother, thou wilt be missed. Interment at Deer Park. Requiescat in pace. HIS PASTOR.

FIKE.

As we have not seen any items from this place for some time we will try to write a few articles to be published in your valuable paper. As Sunflower has not written for some time we presume it was caught while yet green by Jack Frost and we don't suppose it will be fit to feed chickens, as sunflowers only last through the summer and fall.

Now as the old year has drawn to a close and the new year is before us, we all should feel thankful that we have been permitted to enjoy the good things of the old year, and each one of us should try to enjoy the blessings that this year brings us.

John H. Thomas killed three hogs averaging 411 pounds each. Franklin T. Fike killed three hogs averaging 405 pounds each. These are a few of the many good hogs killed in this section.

Now we believe a few words concerning Fike postoffice and master will be of benefit to some; namely, those who stand and try to read letters through the envelopes while the mail is being exchanged. We believe that the postmaster should prohibit such. It it an evident fact that a certain man of this community does not take his eyes off of the mail while the exchange is being made, and we do believe if that man would mind his own business it would be all he could do.

Prof. L. K. Fike, principal of Sand Spring school, had a spelling bee some time ago and we might say it was a phiz for it phizzed all the way through.

The professor of vocal music says "he intends to quit leading the choir at Fike unless they get new books."

The people are preparing to erect a new store in Markleysburg, Pa., in the place of the one burnt down some time ago for G. W. and M. G. Umbel

THE LAST LEAF UPON THE TREE.

The last leaf upon the tree
Swayed by the winter's blast—
All beauty gone, and usefulness,
Alone it hung as travelers passed.

One came bent down with age,
Shivering with the winter's chill—
Beheld the leaf so brown and sear
Clinging to the branches still.

We are much alike, lone leaf, said he
We cannot all go first, you see—
But sad, indeed, it is to be
The last leaf upon the tree.

We are sadly left alone,
Useless, helpless, forgotten of all,
In this winter time of life
Waiting our time to fall.

A touch from the hand of God,
A breath from the clouded skies,
Rest has come at last,
The leaf and the old man dies.

JUST A FARMER

By FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet

"WHAT'S your notion 'bout goin' to town, Sairy?" And Farmer Lish Hopkius paused at the door, his shoulders still humping for a position inside the coat that was beginning to strain across the back. "Suit ye to a T, hey; wouldn't it, Sairy?"

"Well, no. I don't guess so today, Lish," was the placid answer. "It's ben my bakin' day, an' now I've got to black up the stove an' wash the floor. Ye'd have to wait too long for me to git ready."

"Oh, I don't mean today!" with a grin. "I mean move up for good an' all. Sell the farm an' be town folks like the best o' 'em. I'd go into business, an' ye'd be so ye could have comp'ny an' see somebody most every day. I guess we could stand up straight with 'em, hey?"

His wife gazed at him blankly for a moment, then dropped upon a chair, her favorite mode of expressing astonishment.

"Ye don't mean"—

"Yes, I do mean jest that! I've been thinkin' on 't for consider'ble of a spell, an' that letter from Hiram Potter out west sayin' he'd made $40,000 merchandisin' clinched the rivets close up. I've been a fool, Sairy."

"I dunno, Lish. Folks round here say ye've done well."

"Well," he snorted, with profound self disgust, "for farmin' round here, mebbe. I've cleared off the mortgage an' put $1,000 in the bank an' got together a pretty good head o' stock, but I've been twenty years a-doin' it, Sairy, twenty years, an' I've worked like a dog sixteen hours a day an' more. I wan't goin' to miss anything for lack o' hard work. No, siree. An' now there's Hiram, who wan't thought nigh so smart as me at school, an' Reuben Smith, who keeps the hotel over to the Corners, an' Nathan Taylor, who sells us groc'ries, an' others. All of 'em have been wearin' good clothes right along an' takin' money over their counters in handfuls, an' when there was offices an' honors to be given it was them as was went to."

He drew his cap a little lower down and his collar a little higher up and peered at her through the narrow slit as though expecting some comment. "Suit ye to a T, hey?" he repeated.

She nodded reflectively.

"I dunno but 'twill," she conceded. "I'll miss the chickens an' buttermakin', but they be work, an', then, as ye say, I can see somebody most every day. N-no. I guess I won't mind."

"Course ye won't," he declared. "We'll be town folks an' will have to put on our best bibs an' tuckers every day. Ye'll set on a stuffed cheer talkin' to comp'ny an' takin' in money, an' in the evenin's there'll be a lot gathered round my store talkin' politics an' things, an' they won't cost me a cent for entertainment, like visitors gener'ly do, but will be bringin' me in mere money."

"Ye don't suppose there'd be no hitch 'bout—'bout ye doin' it, Lish?" she inquired.

"Hitch?"—indignantly—"when Hiram an' Reuben an' Nathan have all done it an' made money! Well, I guess not. But I'll go an' look round some. Folks in town are gener'ly pretty keen scented on money, an' if they git wind o' my needin' a house to live in an' a store to merchandise in they might think rents ought to be a little higher. I'll look round sort o' casual. But ye're sure ye favor the idee, Sairy? I don't want to go into nothin' that ye couldn't smooth down to."

"Oh, I'll like it all right," she said placidly. "I'm sure to. Ye needn't bother 'bout that, Lish. I've always hankered to shop w[illegible]mbin' in an' out a waggin. I'm [illegible]hefty. An' say, Lish," raising her voice as he opened the door and let in a rush of air and whirling snow, "be sure an' beat 'em down some."

It was late in the evening when he returned, but from the way the wagon rattled by the house and the unnecessarily loud "Whoa!" which came to her when it reached the barn she felt that something momentous had happened, and this feeling was made a certainty when Lish flung open the door and she saw him trying to straighten his face into an expression of indifference.

"Supper ready, Sairy?" he demanded airily. "I swan, I'm most starved!"

"Ye know it's ready, Lish," she said quietly. "It always is at 7 to a minute. You know it's been gettin' cold jest an hour an' a half. So ye've hired a place?"

"Ye ain't wuth a cent for news, Sairy," he grumbled. "Ye either scent it out miles ahead or take it all for granted. I'd as soon have a stick t' tell somethin' to. How'd ye know I've hired a place?"

"Goodness land," scornfully, "it's stickin' out all over ye, Lish! I knowed it by the way the wheels went round when ye went by."

"Don't suppose the wheels told ye what place I hired an' how much I'm to pay an' when we're goin' to move?" he asked.

"No," she confessed, "exceptin' they said ye was consider'bly set up, an' I figgered from that ye'd got the old drug store stand. That's the biggest store in the best part o' the town, an' it is the only one I know on as bein' empty just now."

Lish chuckled.

"Wheels are mighty onreliable things to go by," he declared, "though I did hint sort o' casual 'bout that very idea-tical store. But, law, they wanted $60 a month for it, much as I'd think the place could be wuth for a whole year. I jest laffed. Then I found Wood & Co.'s dry goods store would be empty the 1st of April, an' I went an' looked that over. The drug store folks said their place bein' on the corner made it valuable, an' as Wood & Co. was right in the middle of a block I figgered it might be cheap enough to wait for till April. But I didn't look round much. When they said $50 I jest turned an' walked off."

He stretched himself more comfortably across the chairs and chuckled again.

"Good thing, though," he went on reflectively. "It set me to lookin' round. Now I've got the nicest, quietest an' best place in the whole town, 'cordin' to my notion. There's big shade trees right in front, an' there ain't no rush an' rumblin' o' people an' waggins. Customers can come in an' go out easy an' comfortable-like without no danger o' bein' run over nor nothin'. We can almost make believe we're livin' in the country, Sairy, an' the best of it is I only pay $10 a month. Deacon Rounds wanted $15, but I beat him down to $10. Ye see, he built the place two years ago an' has never been able to rent it."

"Deacon Rounds' store. Ain't that consider'able way out?"

"Only three streets. Buyers 'll be glad to come that fur jest for the quiet an' comfort'bleness o' the place. Why, we have to go eight miles for our groc'ries an' things. No; it's a bargain, Sairy. Squire Brown's goin' to take the farm an' stock jest as they stand for $3,500. He'll be out tomorrow with the papers. Then we'll move right off. I want to open the store next week."

Her eyes widened a little at this.

"But ye ain't got no stock nor nothin' yet, Lish," she said.

He rubbed his hands gleefully.

"That's all fixed, too, Sairy," he beamed. "I done a gist o' bizness up there. Some folks 'd 'a' took two days for it an' then thought themselves smart. I had figgered on havin' to go to the city an' mebbe payin' as much as $25 for car fares an' expenses that wouldn't turn me in a cent, but a feller that was showin' samples to Mr. Wood follered me out, an'—an'—well, he got the whole thing from me an' is comin' down next week to show us samples."

"I s'pose ye talked it over with Nathan Taylor fust?" she asked. "He's done bizness there the heft o' his life an' could tell ye consider'ble. An' he's your own fourth cousin an' a schoolmate."

Lish snorted.

"Nathan Taylor! Huh! Don't s'pose he's goin' to encourage opposition, do ye? I did speak to him a little, an' he advised me to take the drug store stand; said it was at the best part o' the bizness street an' on a corner an' that the extra trade would pay the big rent a dozen times over. The idee! I seen in a minute what he was arter. Long's I was bound to go in, he felt the faster I rushed through the money the quicker I'd git out. Why, jest one year's rent would take half a quarter of all we've got! An', more'n that, he said I'd better be pretty careful how I left things to them drummers an' that I ought to go up to the city an' hunt round through the stores fer jest the things I needed an' the best prices. But he didn't say a word 'bout the $25 or more expenses that wouldn't turn me in a cent. Oh, no! He even hinted I'd better hire a bright young man with experience to help in the store."

The next week the drummer was as prompt as his word and came down with an extensive assortment of samples. An entire day was spent with him in the big, empty store, which Sairy had swept and scrubbed with her own hands. At first they were deliberate and circumspect in their buyings, Sairy being for ordering a dress pattern from this and that, a few yards of one ribbon and another, a piece of braid or a cake of fancy soap, and Lish for breaking dozens and dividing the boxes and packages. But after the drummer had repeatedly assured them that they were purchasing to fill a store and not for their own immediate necessities for a few months ahead they grew bolder and yet bolder, and finally, when a passion for buying had begun to possess them, they ordered from everything shown and toward the end recklessly. After it was all over and the drummer had left they drew long breaths and looked at each other curiously.

"We've bought a sight, Lish," Sairy faltered.

"I should say so," rubbing his chin thoughtfully. "More'n was ever put into a store at one time before, I guess. But it's bizness," brightening up some. "As the feller said, we can't open a store with a yard o' 'lastic."

"No, I s'pose not. But how much do ye think we got, Lish?" her face still anxious.

"I dunno," he confessed slowly, "an' ain't even an idee. I tried to go slow at first an' keep count, but I got off the track. Mebbe a thousand, two thousand, three thousand, though 'tain't likely so much as the last. We've never bought more'n $20 or $30 worth at a time before, an' it's hard to guess. But $2,000 or $3,000 is good for a mighty big pile o' stuff."

The second day the goods came down in boxes and barrels and kegs and bundles and in great square cases that required two men to roll from the freight platform into the wagon. Lish hired a team and a man to help and did all the hauling himself. The next morning the bill came.

Lish opened and looked at it eagerly, then drew a long breath and rubbed his eyes and looked at it again.

He seized his cap and jammed it viciously upon his head and left the store. The village bank was upon the principal street, and the cashier was an old friend. It was upon this bank that Squire Brown had given him a check for $3,500. The cashier happened to be alone.

By this time Lish had regained control of himself. Slipping the invoice into his pocket, he drew out the check and placed it in the cashier's window.

"I'd like that cashed, Mr. White," he said, "an' I want to borry $600 more. Ye know I'm good for it, an' anyhow there's stock enough in the store."

"Oh, that's all right, Mr. Hopkins," laughed the cashier. "I never knew the time when your word wasn't good for $600. But how happens it you need more just now? You were telling me the other day that you only intended to put half the money into goods now and hold the rest as a reserve."

Lish grinned ruefully.

"I guess I wan't much used to buyin'," he confessed. "Look here."

He produced the invoice and spread it out in the window. The cashier looked it over curiously.

"I don't know much about this line of goods, Mr. Hopkins," he said at length, "but it seems to me there's a good many things here that won't find much sale. Now, this six dozen doorbells, for instance."

"The drummer said they were good sellers," ventured Lish.

"Well, perhaps they are," acquiesced the cashier. "Of course I don't know. But about the $600. If I were you I wouldn't hire the money just yet. Drummers have prices that are supposed to cover a generous system. Didn't your man say anything about it?"

"He said I could have thirty or sixty days' time jest as well's not, but I told him I'd rather pay cash."

"Very good, provided you have the money to pay and also provided he allows you a fair discount for paying it. You'd better wait and find that out. Send the firm what money you have and let the six hundred go until the drummer comes round again. You may take in enough by that time to pay him. At any rate, find out his discount for cash, and, if it's more than our interest, come to me and I will let you have the money. Only don't hire unless you're obliged to."

One morning a few weeks later Nathan Taylor entered the store. Lish was looking over his account book, kept with a lead pencil in much the same manner as he had jotted down items while on the farm. Sairy was at another counter, engaged in rubbing her hand back and forth across a new piece of velveteen which had just been taken from the case. Nathan said, "Good morning," and then paused and glanced critically about the store, with evident disapproval in his eyes.

"You've done just what I was afraid of, Lish," he said, at length. "A third of the goods won't sell in all the world. That fellow was too slippery and has loaded you with a lot of unsalable stuff."

Several times during the spring and summer Lish was sorely pressed for money, and more than once he started to the bank, but each time he turned back before reaching there.

But the end did not come until another winter, just one year from the time he had left the farm. Then one day a tall, strongly built man in a heavy coat strode into the room.

"Elisha Hopkins, I suppose?" he interrogated.

"Yes. What can I do for ye?"

The man did not answer. Taking a paper from his pocket, he unfolded it deliberately and read in a slow, ponderous voice for several minutes. Then he looked at the startled figure behind the counter.

"Going to pay it?" he asked.

"Can't jest now," Lish answered weakly.

"I suppose so." He walked to the counter and held out his hand. "I may as well take the key," he said.

Lish nodded toward the door, from the lock of which the key had not been removed. The sheriff went and took it out and then held the door open significantly. Lish realized that it was for him to go out.

How he stumbled across the room and out into the snow and across the yard to his own house he scarcely knew, only that it was a feeling of thankfulness that Sairy had not happened to be in the store.

She was bending over the stove when he entered and sank heavily into a chair.

"Goodness land!" she exclaimed, suddenly straightening up. "What is the matter, Lish?"

"Nothin'"—drearily—"only the sheriff's took the store an' shet me on the outside."

"What?" She came quickly to his side and placed a hand upon his shoulder. "For money?"

"Yes; twelve hundred."

"An' can't ye pay?"

"No. An' if I could there's most another twelve hundred that'll be asked for soon 's this is known. Mebbe I could raise it all to the bank"—slowly—"but I dunno 's I want to. I'm gettin' tired o' the whole thing."

"But the goods are worth more'n what we owe, ain't they?"

"Twice as much, 'cordin' to what we paid, but there ain't no [illegible] they'll fetch to auction. Not [illegible] enough to pay the debts [illegible]."

She was silent for some minutes, looking down at him.

"The man [illegible] farm to [illegible] last [illegible] wants to [illegible]."

Lish looked up quickly.

"An'—an' wouldn't ye mind goin' back, Sairy?" he asked.

"Mind?" she asked. "Why, Lish, I never did really want to leave the farm!"

He rose sturdily to his feet.

"Then we'll go back," he declared. And there was something that was almost gladness in his tone. "I know how to run a farm, an' tryin' to keep a store 's a dog's life anyway."

God, The Creator.

When Michael Angelo overlaid the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel with frescoes that make its common plaster more precious than gold, he dipped his pencils into the first chapter of Genesis. Each successive panel matches its respective paragraph—the Separation of Light and Darkness; the Creation of the Sun and Moon; of Trees and Plants; of Adam; of Eve, and so on. The frescoes are indescribably majestic, but they fall short of the narrative which inspired them. That is unapproachable in literature or art. It is Divine.

If the immortal Florentine had drawn his inspiration from any other cosmogony than that of Moses, the Vatican ceiling would have been marred with the incongruous shapes of man's wild fancy and wilder fear. Dualism would have been there—a devil as powerful as God; or Polytheism—gods many and all in a wrangle, one pulling down what the other set up; or Pantheism—an eternal matter, insensate, yet evolving itself in various stages, the thing fashioned greater than that which made it; or such grotesque ideals of the universe as, for example, that of the Hindu with its pyramid of snake, turtle, and elephant, and triple disk.

Instead of all this we see on that lustrous roof the ineffable Jehovah in the form of a man, as the Bible itself must needs present Him to us—eternity upon His hoary brow, omniscience beaming in His eye, omnipotence in His outstretched arms, and infinite love in His whole mien. This majestic Father of the world is pictured as proceeding with the complacency of Infinity to hang His lanterns in the sky, to separate air, water, and land. Then He peoples each with creatures suitable to their respective spheres—their bodies cunningly adapted to ether, fluid, and terra firma respectively.

For a seventh time the Almighty "Former of the Skies" spreads His hands in benediction over all His works, and in the seventh epoch there is cessation from creative activity.

This mosaic account of Creation is a miracle in words. Not to this present highly-cultured age, but back three thousand years, to the beginning of literature, must we look for the most satisfactory statement of the origin of things. There through the mists of human speculations, through rising and falling systems of philosophy, Genesis shines like a star ever ascendent. It is not attached to any system of geology, astronomy, or biology. So, as numbers of these have sunk in their turn, Genesis has never been submerged. The book may clash with a hypothesis, it never does with a fact. The narrative is elastic enough to take in all the modern discoveries of physical science, but presents a rim of steel to the vagaries of false science.

Whence came this phenomenal writing? From the genius of man? Then, why is not its equal found in the ancient literature of other nations apparently better situated to produce such a book than the petty and oft-captive Israel? Inspiration is the only adequate explanation of Genesis. The blessed intent of the book is seen by the most casual reader. It is a mirror to reflect the person and attributes of God; it answers, too, the question of the heart as to the origin of nature and of man. It deserves the alliteration, Simple, Sublime, Sufficient.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The difficulty here is to know what not to teach. The paragraph is fairly packed with seed-thoughts. Selection is imperative. Matters of comparative unimportance, but which if once mooted might lead to time-wasting debate should be omttted.

* * * * *

The majesty of the mosaic account of Creation may well be shown by using the crude heathen cosmogonies as a background. The orderly and glorious progress of creation should prompt the exclamation, "O Lord, how manifold are Thy works! in wisdom hast Thou made them all!"

* * * * *

God gave man a quit-claim deed to the world when He said, "Take it, dress and keep it."

* * * * *

Man's dominion over nature was never greater than at the present. He is wresting her secrets and subduing her forces to his use.

* * * * *

The dignity of man's position in nature, the variety, delicacy, and strength of his senses and faculties make one exclaim, "O rich and varied man, thou palace of sight and sound."

* * * * *

Primary teachers have a fascinating task in discovering and banishing the crude and amusing notions about earth, air, sky, water, stars, etc., with which they find little minds packed. A taking object-lesson may be given by laying an orange on the table, and having an apple suspended with a cord revolve about the orange. Orange for sun; apple for earth. What makes day and night, the year and the seasons, may thus be illustrated. Earth may be described as a home, beautiful and comfortable, which God has built for His children—a cellar full of coal and other things we need. The carpet changes every season, so we shall not get tired of looking at it—from green sprinkled with flowers, to russet in the fall, and white in the winter—a house hung with pretty pictures.

A Tramp's Bath.

A story is told about the first run which the now famous Twentieth Century Limited train made from New York to Chicago. The story goes that when the fireman lowered the chute which scoops up water from between the rails and fills the reservoir in the tender he failed to gauge correctly the capacity of the tank, and the water, overflowing, ran through the full length of the vestibuled train, so powerful was the force which impelled it against the door of the first coach.

The railroad company sought to remedy this trouble, and on the next run a blind coach, one without a door opening next to the engine, was used. This proved to be a prevention of the flood trouble.

One night after the Twentieth Century had made a name for itself, a tramp boarded the platform of the first coach as the train was leaving Cleveland. He knew that the next stop was at Toledo more than 100 miles away, and saw an opportunity to travel undisturbed on a limited train, but the fireman saw him as he comfortably settled down for the trip.

When the train took water a few miles out the tank overflowed quite profusely, and again the deluge occurred just before entering Toledo, and the engineer tells that while he was spending a moment with his engine in the depot in Toledo the most washed-out specimen of humanity he had ever seen came up to him and said: "Say mister, what was the names of them two rivers we went through?"

Paroid Roofing—

—Read This Trial Offer on the Roofing That Lasts the Longest.

PAROID is the best ready roofing ever made. You can prove it, to your own satisfaction from a sample, but a better way is to use it.

All we ask is that you try it, and we make the way easy.

Here's Our Offer:

BUY one lot of Paroid; open it; inspect it; apply it to your roof, and if then you are not satisfied that you have the best ready roofing made, send us your name and address, and we will send you a check for the full cost of the roofing, including the cost of applying it.

Is there any offer we could make you fairer than that?

Could we afford to make such an offer if we were not sure that Paroid is better than other ready roofings?

It is better; we are sure; and this is why:

Four things enter into the making of a good roofing:

The felt; the saturation; the coating; and the method of laying.

Paroid excels on all four points.

The felt is the foundation. If it is not right to start with, no treatment of any kind can make it into a good roofing.

We know that our felt is right because we make it in our own mills (established in 1817.)

We make it because we cannot buy a felt elsewhere good enough for Paroid.

Other manufacturers who buy their felt in the open market—wherever they can get it cheapest—necessarily take big chances at the very start.

We couldn't give you the money-back guaranty we do if we did not make the complete roofing under our direct supervision.

Paroid roofing is not merely dipped in a solution, but is soaked in a water proofing mixture of our own, which renders every fibre of it—through and through—absolutely water proof.

And then the coating. Paroid is coated on both sides with a smoother, thicker, tougher and more flexible coating than is on any other roofing made.

There is no room for doubt about it. You need not take our word for it. Use your own judgment. Compare Paroid with other kinds. You will find that Paroid is the only roofing that doesn't break when you give it a short bend. If you can freeze the various samples you'll have a still better test, and you'll find Paroid the only flexible roof in a zero temperature, while others crack like an icicle.

But even the best roofing must be properly applied.

In every roll of Paroid you will find a complete roofing kit, with a supply of square, rust-proof, water-proof caps. The only rust-proof cap made.

These caps are patented. You get them only with Paroid.

Being square, they give you larger binding surface and so hold the roof more securely.

Being water-proofed on both sides, they do not rust and work loose and cause a leak, as all other caps do, sooner or later.

And when the roof is laid, you not only have a good and durable, but you have a sightly roof. Its smooth, uniform surface, makes it the best in appearance of all ready roofings.

And there you are:

The best felt for a foundation;

The best and most thorough water proofing saturation;

The best and most flexible coating;

The most sightly ready roofing made;

And a positive money-back guaranty.

Will you try it on these terms?

They are some of the reasons why Paroid has stood the test of time for the United States Government, for railway, factory, farm and poultry buildings.

It lasts longest. It gives best service. And we stand back of it.

May we send you samples and prices?

B. W. HARVEY, SCHELL, WEST VA.

The End of Jericho's Famous Liars' Club

There Was Too Much Truth In Abijah Goodheart's Story to Continue Further Business.

[Copyright, 1905, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.]

WE had had a Liars' club in Jericho for over five years, and it was admitted on all sides that it had been a great benefit to the town. It met at the postoffice every night in the week, and on Saturday nights it drew farmers in from five miles around. Many of the latter would have gone to Dobbs Ferry to buy their groceries but for the club. They just loved to sit around on the barrels and boxes and hear the liars lie, and it was calculated that their purchases at the stores amounted to over $100 a week.

In addition to the farmers, whenever a peddler, a lightning rod man or a piano agent found himself within five miles of Jericho and night or Sunday coming on he made for the village, so as to be present at the meeting of the

THEY MET RIGHT AT HIS CAMP AND FOUGHT AND KILLED EACH OTHER.

Liars' club. Strangers passing through and intending to simply stay overnight at the tavern would hear of the club and stop for two or three days. The three ministers of the town had set out time after time to break up the club. Deacon Spooner was chairman and a member of the church, but when they argued and appealed and threatened to discipline he merely replied:

"We are a club of liars, but we don't lie to hurt any one. They are just slick, pleasant lies, told to pass the time away and to help along the business of the town. Take away our liars and we would degenerate into a one horse burg in two weeks."

The Liars' club had passed its fifth year and was gaining on it all the time when there arrived in Jericho one day a little old man who gave his name as Abijah Goodheart. He came to look for a relative, but the person had moved away. Mr. Goodheart wouldn't have stayed beyond two days if he hadn't happened to hear of the club. His old wrinkled face lighted up with eagerness, he rubbed his hands with glee, and he wanted an introduction to Deacon Spooner at once. When the deacon was brought around the two fell in with each other, and that night Mr. Goodheart occupied the post of honor on the corner of the counter. Nine of the best liars of the club were selected to give him specimens, and as he heard them reel off their yarns his face was wreathed in smiles, and he said he hadn't enjoyed an evening so well in twenty years. When the nine liars had finished the stranger was asked to tell a whopper. He was promptly willing.

There are plenty of people yet living in Jericho who remember every incident of that story. The old man was prospecting in Colorado for gold and remained in the mountains too long. Winter found him there, and he built a shanty and had been living on the carcass of a deer he had killed when there came a snowslide. He was carried a full mile and buried under thirty feet of snow. Some logs lying on top of bowlders made an arch and thus saved him. His gun was gone, he had neither blankets nor provisions, and he realized that it was impossible for him to dig his way out. After three days of hunger he turned to his boots. They lasted him eight days. He managed to eat them down to the last inch, but gave it as his opinion that they didn't begin with cold chicken as a steady diet. After three days more of gnawing hunger he laid him down to die, but Providence was looking out for him. A grizzly bear was tunneling in from the west to get him, and at the same time another was tunneling in from the east. They met right at his camp and fought and killed each other and supplied him with food for two months. At the end of that time, during a thunderstorm, a bolt of lightning struck the snow and bored a hole down to him and let him escape. In escaping he found a nugget of gold weighing a hundred pounds and had been living on the sale of it ever since.

Of course there were a hundred little incidents connected with the story that I have not related. Taken altogether, it was thrillingly interesting, and Mr. Goodheart was given a vote of thanks and the freedom of the town. He was asked to repeat the story night after night. Word seemed to go all over the country about it, and within a week there began to be inquiries for vacant houses and real estate. Within two weeks there had been five or horse trades, several hogs and cows had changed hands, and Alvin Johnson, the oldest man in the town, stood on the steps of the postoffice and said:

"I'm a-tellin' you that a boom has struck Jericho. It's no ephemeral boom, founded upon the amount of catnip grown around here, but it's something that has come to stay and make a second Chicago of our town. Let us give three cheers for our friend Goodheart. But for that lie of his we might have lived and died unknown to the world."

The three ministers got together and talked it over and then sent for the old man. They told him that he ought to be ashamed of himself and gave him a general raking down. He listened to what they had to say and then replied:

"Gentlemen, I have told a story before the Liars' club. Do you receive it as a lie or the truth?"

"Why, it's a falsehood pure and simple."

"Sorry to disagree with you, gentlemen, but that story is the solemn truth. I can prove every incident of it."

At that they grew more severe with him and talked about warrants and constables, and when he left them he had tears in his eyes. Deacon Spooner was sent around to see him and tell him he had better go a little slow, but his reply was:

"Why, I thought you all knew that I was telling the solemn truth. There has been so much lying here that I thought I would slip in something truthful for a change."

"Say, you do it nicely!" complimented the deacon as he winked at him.

"But I can prove the story to be true."

"It's the slickest lie I ever heard, and you shall receive all credit for it. Don't trade it off for any other."

Other men complimented him on his gigantic lie and winked at him when he declared he had been telling the truth, and the iron entered the old man's soul. He wrote letters to Colorado, and in the course of a couple of weeks he got affidavits as to the truth of his story. They even sent on claws from the feet of the bears. Bankers, merchants and ministers united in saying that Mr. Goodheart had never been known to tell a lie. He got all this and much more, but Deacon Spooner came around and poked him in the ribs and winked, and the ministers called on him and said that his moral example was dragging scores of men down to perdition. After they had told him this the old man went to the Liars' club and told his story once more. He took plenty of time and rung in all the old incidents and a few new ones. He was listened to with the closest attention, and when he had finished he shook hands with every liar and walked away with a mournful face on him. Several parties tried to cheer him up by saying that he ought to get a position with a daily newspaper as circulation manager, but no smile came to his face.

The next morning it was discovered that Mr. Goodheart had committed suicide by hanging himself in his room at the hotel. Three days later two men from the west arrived. They brought more proofs, and the ministers and all others had to knuckle under and admit that the old man's story was gospel truth. That killed the Jericho boom in a day and dissolved the Liars' club in a week. There was novelty in lies, but none in truth. In general, the town was conscience stricken and anxious to make reparation. Every one turned out to the funeral, a gravestone was bought by popular subscription, and when it was placed at the head of the old man's grave it bore the words:

"Here lies Abijah Goodheart, but he wasn't lying when he told the story of the snowslide." M. QUAD.

Mr. Mousoud

By HOWARD FIELDING

Copyright, 1906, by Charles W. Hooke

IT had been a bad Saturday for Billy Allenwood. Somebody hadn't come downtown that day. Somebody else, a bookkeeping creature for the other, had no authority to advance money on uncompleted serial stories. Billy made the rounds, but there was no money anywhere, and when he went to take Dorothy Vincent to dinner he had only $3 in his pocket.

Dorothy was an orphan and an heiress. She received a check on the first of every month, but, though there are few characters so strong as not to be affected by security and regularity of income, Dorothy remained a good bohemian and as reckless with money as you could wish your dearest friend to be. She reveled in rich and dainty fabrics, which she transformed by her own art and labor into the most bewitching garments. On this particular evening she wore a tenderly exquisite creation in a gray tone, and carried a little gray purse which contained her all, the sum of 35 cents. This purse was intrusted to Billy's care.

A strange subject of discussion occupied them at dinner and on the way to Dorothy's house. Billy had an opportunity to join with two other men in starting a magazine, of which he was to be editor, but they stipulated that he should contribute $1,500 to the capital. Impossibility is not defined in any dictionary so adequately as by that statement. Billy could not have raised 1,500 cranberries at a dollar a bushel, but Dorothy could raise dollars, and she insisted that she should be permitted to disturb her meager patrimony to the extent required and become a partner in the enterprise. She would lend the money to Billy and go shares with him. To him, however, her little fortune was the only redeeming feature of a world otherwise ill ordered beyond the power of language to describe. He knew what miseries she thus escaped—few men knew better than Billy—and he would sooner have disturbed the law of gravitation which holds us to the world than have dislodged the anchor of Dorothy's safety.

He was telling her so in very eloquent language as they strolled along, when they were suddenly aware of a flurry in the throng and the quick gathering of a crowd. A man had fallen from the platform of a crowded car and now sat on the curbstone, dazed and bleeding. It seemed that there had been an attempt to pick his pocket and that the thief, detected, had pushed his intended victim to the street. As usual, the car had gone on, leaving only the most contradictory rumors in its wake.

The man was under middle age and of a very prosperous appearance, a gentleman evidently, for he showed himself superior to his mishap, even though it had bereft him of a good share of his consciousness. Before any one had raised a hand to help him he got upon his feet with a certain dignity, though the dullness of his eyes showed that his wits were whirling. He found a cardcase in his pocket, after somnambulous fumbling, gave a card to a cabman, and when the door of the vehicle had been opened got in unassisted. Cabby mounted to the box and drove away.

It was only a few blocks from that spot to Dorothy's house. At the door she said, "You have my purse, Billy."

But, alas, he hadn't it.

"Never mind," said she cheerily. "There was next to nothing in it. Good night."

Billy said "Good night" and walked down the street.

"I must have dropped it where that fellow was hurt," said he to himself, and the recollection that the purse was gray, the tint of asphalt paving, gave him absurd encouragement. So he returned to the scene of the accident, praying for a miracle, but he did not find the purse. Instead, he found a sealed envelope, set up against the curb as if by design and most excellently placed to avoid observation. There was nothing either printed or written upon the envelope except this:

Mr Mousoud

Billy held it as almost a certainty that this was a note which had been dropped by the man who had been hurt. Probably it had been dislodged from his pocket when he fell and had remained caught in his clothing while he dragged himself to the curb. So far as Billy could judge, it was precisely in the right spot to fit this hypothesis. He put the note into his pocket and the next moment had forgotten it.

Sunday's papers contained no mention of the accident to Mr. Mousoud. The city directory did not contain his name. In Monday morning's papers Billy placed a small advertisement among the "Lost and Found," but there was no response. All inquiries failed, and in the course of the week Billy put the note away in a drawer of his writing table and forgot it. Far more pressing matters claimed his attention. Dorothy was called to her home in the west, and a harrowing fear tormented Billy that, despite the positive commands that he had laid upon her, she had gone to get money for the magazine. Meanwhile the scheme boiled.

One afternoon, following a conference upon the all important topic, Billy returned to his home so crazed with enthusiasm that, happening to find the lean, old serving maid dusting his room, he began to deliver an oration to her on the subject of magazine publication. His eloquence produced an unexpected effect, for the woman became wildly excited and finally fell to the floor in a sort of fit. Then Billy ran for the landlady, with whose assistance he carried the hysterical servant to her room.

Returning to his own place after this unusual exercise he sat down to reflect upon the strange happenings that had recently varied the monotony of his existence and was presently confronted by one that overtopped the others—topped everything he could remember to have seen outside of dreamland. There was upon the desk a paperweight of painted porcelain, a Christmas present from Dorothy and very dear to his heart. Protruding from beneath it he now beheld something green, and this green substance proved to be four bank notes, each of the denomination of $500.

"Dear, dear little girl," he said aloud, and the tears rushed into his eyes. This was not money any more, it was her love, and he laid down his head on these poor counters in the pretty game of trade and kissed them.

Presently he arose, put the money into his safest pocket and strode away to Dorothy's house, where he was informed that Miss Vincent had not yet returned to town. Billy knew better. He perceived a trick and instantly formulated one of his own. He telegraphed to Dorothy in the west (though he knew she wasn't there) as follows:

I can't take it, Dorothy, but you're the greatest girl in the world.

In the early evening came this reply:

You must. But how did you find out about it? DOROTHY.

To which he responded:

I have the money and will hold it for you. I cannot use it as you wish.

At 1 o'clock in the morning the doorbell clanged, and Billy received this telegram:

Impossible. Did not mail check till today. Can't understand what you mean. DOROTHY.

Billy had not money enough to continue this correspondence by wire without breaking one of the $500 bills, so he wrote a long letter which he mailed about daybreak, and by the last delivery that afternoon he received Dorothy's letter, full of subtle persuasion and inclosing her check for $1,500. Three days later came Dorothy herself, and in the thrilling conversation which ensued she denied in the most explicit manner all knowledge of the larger sum.

It will be remembered that Louis XI. of France had many solemn forms of adjuration, only one of which he held to be binding, and he would never tell which of them it was. Few men have been so clever as Louis, but nearly all women are. Protestation with mental reservation is the natural weapon of the sex. As a student of human nature Billy Allenwood knew this, and, though he held Dorothy to be the flawless pearl of womanhood, he still could not free his mind of the notion that the four big bank notes had once been hers. It was therefore with an indefinable disfavor, a sense of something gone from his own soul, that he at last paid down the $2,000 into the capital of the great scheme.

The $1,500 which was confessedly Dorothy's was placed in bank, but in the early days, when the scheme seemed surely winning, Billy lost his balance wheel, veered to the delusion that he had foolishly shut Dorothy out from the greatest opportunity of her life and at last permitted her to invest her money. Then came the later days, the days of disappointment, of expenses marvelously swollen and receipts miraculously shrunk.

On the blackest of black days, when Billy had left the office merely to get away from it and not because his work was done, he was aware of a remembered face in the crowd, and a name leaped into his mind.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said he. "Are you Mr. Mousoud?"

"No," replied the stranger, with a touch of excellent courtesy even in so small a matter.

"I happened to be present when you met with an accident two or three months ago," said Billy, "and afterward I found a letter on the spot," and he described the occurrence.

"It was mine," said the other, who seemed surprised and even more amused. "May I ask what has become of it?"

"I have it at my rooms," answered Billy. "Would you care to come with me and get it?"

"If you were on your way there, yes," said he.

There followed an introduction whereby it appeared that this man was Julian Winser, president of the old Livingstone bank, in which position he had recently succeeded his father, as Billy knew from newspaper reports. Letters were not popular with Billy just then, for the officials of the bank and the magazine kept its directors in funds and had turned a deaf ear to all pleas for accommodation. Yet Mr. Winser seemed a very decent fellow, despite his occupation.

When they came to Billy's room he could not at first remember where he had put the Mousoud envelope, and it was by accident that he found it in a drawer which he had not opened since it was put away.

"WE KNOW THAT YOU OPENED THIS ENVELOPE."

The envelope had been torn and was empty.

Dazed and ashamed, Billy laid it upon the desk without a word, and the two men looked into each other's eyes a moment.

"You have no idea who did this?" said Winser.

Billy shook his head.

"What was in it?" he asked with the dull manner of a discouraged man, and he made a vain search of the drawer.

Winser had not replied. He was bending over the envelope and smiling.

"There is a strange thing about my penmanship," said he at last. "It is always legible, but usually not in the right way. Yes; that's Mr. Mousoud sure enough, but when I wrote it I supposed that it was 'two thousand.'"

The breath went out of Billy in a gasp. He took the envelope out of Winser's hand and stared at the writing.

"Two thousand? Not two thousand dollars?"

"Yes," responded Winser. "I put the money into an envelope and wrote the amount on the outside because I had another—two others, in fact, with different sums."

"I found $2,000 on this desk," said Billy, "and I've lost it."

"Lost it?"

"In a weekly magazine—Truth. Probably you haven't seen a copy. It's a failure."

"You surprise me. It certainly looks prosperous. Did you invest my money there?"

Upon this Billy told the whole story, and it sounded to him like a lie, but Winser gave no sign of disbelief.

"Of course I should not have used the money without knowing where it came from," said he in conclusion, "but I persuaded myself that somebody had been my good angel. There are two or three men in this city who were close friends of mine in college and are now very rich. Miss Vincent had often heard me speak of them, and though she knew that the acquaintance had been entirely broken off because of the difference of our circumstances she might have found means to communicate my need to one of them. The theory was wild, but so extraordinary an event seemed to excuse a little dreaming. Of course I never connected this money with the Mousoud letter, which I had practically forgotten."

"The money," said Winser, "must have been left on your desk that afternoon when you found it. Had any one been here?"

"I questioned the servant as soon as she was well. She said that a man had called for me twice, but she described a poor devil of an artist—a friend of mine who had been here before. He wasn't the man, however."

Winser took some seconds for reflection and then said:

"I am a good questioner. May I see this servant?"

"Certainly," said Billy, and he rang the bell.

The meager servitor answered the summons promptly.

"Madam," said Winser, "we know that you opened this envelope and took out the money and put a part of it under that paperweight. What did you do with the rest of it?"

She stood rigid for an instant, facing Winser, and then turned to Billy in a blaze of wrath.

"You lie!" she screamed. "You got it—all of it. I never got nothin', and you know it. You came in here that day, and I never was out of the room till you came. That's the truth, and I don't care what you say. The money was in my hand, and I put it on the desk, and you took it, and"—

"That is all that we require," said Winser, and with Billy's help he succeeded in persuading the woman that she was charged with no crime.

"And now, Mr. Allenwood," he resumed when they were alone, "we have cleared up this simple mystery, and the matter stands between us two alone. It seems that I am in a sense a partner in Truth, a very excellent magazine to read, but not to own, as I judge from what you have said. May I venture to intrude a little further into its affairs?"

Billy gave a clear statement of the condition of the magazine, and this was the first of several conferences between them. The final result was that Winser agreed to loan a certain sum of money, with the proviso that he should name a new business manager. What share of the ultimate success of Truth should be credited to Winser's appointee and what share to his financial backing I would not wish to decide, but the magazine is a great property today, as everybody knows. The shares held by Allenwood and Miss Vincent are worth a good deal of money, and there are salaries as well as profits. These interests were recently consolidated by the marriage of the parties, and one of the most prized and most valuable of the wedding presents was from Julian Winser, who assumed for that occasion the name of "Mr. Mousoud."

Evolution of Spanking.

[An electric spanking machine is now in use in a public school in Peoria, Ill.—News Item.]

WE call to mind the master grim,
With horny hands of leather.
Oh, well we all remember him
When we were tads together!
For when we'd shin the orchard wall,
Hook school or other pranking,
His bony palms would give us all
The soundest kind of spanking.

Time passed; the master feeble grew;
His palms lost force and fire.
But still our pranks were far from few;
Each day we raised his ire
So from the schoolhouse on the hill
He plucked a cypress shingle
And spanked us one by one until
Each nerve would dance and jingle.

But, though the shingle left its mark
Until we studied standing,
Each day would bring another lark,
Despite stern rules commanding.
Our blunders made the master rave,
Our pranks were still increasing,
Until he got a barrel stave
And spanked us without ceasing.

The old schoolhouse has passed away;
Likewise the good old master,
But if he taught his class today
Perhaps he'd spank them faster.
He'd touch a button near at hand
And start those paddles swinging.
Some fifty spanks each second and Each one spark charged and stinging.
—Victor A. Hermann in Judge.

Our Pet Slang.

The noted foreigner was sorely puzzled.

"Tell me of ze American language. Et ees so queer. Ze conductor on ze street car told me to skiddoo. What does skiddoo mean, kind gentleman?"

"Skiddoo? Oh, that means twenty-three."

"Twenty-three? And what does that mean?"

"Why, beat it."

"Beat eet? How extraordinary! What does—er—beat eet mean?"

"Why, vamoose."

"By the shade of Napoleon! And what does vamoose mean?"

"Fade away! To the woods for yours! Are you on? Why, they'll hand you a lemon. They"—

THE NEW YEAR.

There is not a heart which takes note of the changing seasons that is not stirred with some unrest as the old year gathers itself to the numbered past. The losses, the disappointments, the bereavements it has witnessed come up afresh as it withdraws from our grasp its withered hand; and if its hours have been bright with hopes fulfilled and joy that sweetened our daily cup, we feel all the more deeply the sadness of parting. But we are disturbed most of all because we have not left in its keeping a memorial of ourselves with which we are content. If we could recall the tablet and retouch the sad inscription; if we could blot out here and there a bitter word; if we could live over again some wasted hours to better purpose; if we could see offered once more to our hand the golden opportunities we carelessly missed or wantonly rejected; if we could but hold back the fading form until we had plucked those stings from its memory, we could then let it go with less of self-reproach and listen calmly to the passing bell.

There was beyond question a special providence that guided the choice of the Christmas holiday, when the actual anniversary was yet unknown. Some poets have wondered that it was not placed in the happy springtime, when the whole world is being clothed anew with verdure and bloom after the dreariness of winter. But to the aching heart which feels its sorest need, the lesson it teaches is best adapted to these closing hours of the dying year. It is not sympathy with nature, but proffer of grace that meets the longing of the restless spirit. There is nowhere else a hint of help for the dissatisfied soul. From every field of earth we hear only of law; it is an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. A wasted year haunts us with its menacing finger, and its requiem seals our condemnation. We cannot correct the wrongs that stand charged against us, or redeem the time we have freighted with evil. Just here comes in the Christmas story with its message of healing and hope. The love that has in it the offer of forgiveness comes at the end of the year when we are most blessed with the burden it can alone remove.

A week ago all lands were ringing with the chimes that commemorated the birth of the world's Redeemer. The echoes are still floating in the air; the dying year has heard the sweet refrain, and turns on all who are watching his departure with self accusing memories a pitying look to remind them once more of that which is man's only comfort in life or death. The Star which of old led the wise men from the East and has been offered ever since for human guidance, shines to-day above our path as it did over the manger at Bethlehem, the symbol of pardon and peace.

The possibilities of the future are the same to all. This dividing land-mark separating the past from the future is holy ground. Let us put off for a moment the shoes from our weary, travel-stained feet, and ask what we shall carry with us over the invisible boundary at which we stand. There are some burdens it would be well to lay aside. Enmities are never safe companions at any season, but it is hard to dislodge them when once we take them to our embrace. They seem, however, to cling less tenaciously at the Christmas time, the song of good-will which the shepherds heard having a strange influence to weaken their hold. It is a good time to cast them off once and forever and have done with them. Hate is a corroding canker, and gnaws with unpitying teeth at the heart which gives it a home.

THE SAFEST PLACE FOR MONEY.

A few recent bank failures which present egregious examples of reckless or dishonest banking tend to strengthen the distrust that exists among the less well informed classes of banks as a depository for their savings. This feeling does not exist among men with business knowledge. But its currency among laborers is a strong reason why the banking interest as a whole should support all measures that tends to safe banking.

It is also cause for showing how unfounded and unreasonable is this idea that because there has been a few bank failures, therefore it is safer to hoard money in stockings or teapots. There have been some half-dozen bank failures that attracted attention within the past year or more. Of these one in Pittsburg and one in Philadelphia paid their depositors in full. Of those which have inflicted a partial loss on their depositors—not more than one or two inflicted total loss—the liabilities were, perhaps, $2,000,000. Consider that this is out of a total of 15,000 national banks, savings banks, State banks and trusts companies, with aggregate liabilities of nearly $16,000,000,000, and it is easily seen what an utterly inconsiderable proportion of the whole these losses amount to. To put it in a rough ratio of chances, the man who deposits money in a bank simply at hap-hazzard with inquiry as to the character of the bank runs one chance of losing his money out of about 4,000 by the number of banks, and much less than one chance in 8,000 by the amount involved. If he takes some pains to inquire for a sound, conservative bank there are few safer things on earth than his money when he needs it.

The people who are made uneasy by hearing of wrecked banks note this point. Their chances of taking typhoid fever in Pittsburg are eight times as great as their chances of losing their bank deposits. Yet they would think it silly to run away from Pittsburg on that account. Let them count on the other side the number of hoards that are lost or burned up, or taken by pickpockets, burglars or highwaymen. If they would put these things on the other side of the account they would lose little time in making their deposit in some good banking institution.

The distrust is ignorant and mistaken. The banks of the country as a whole are sound and reliable. They have weathered many a storm in a way that proved their stability. The man who wishes to have his savings savings safe and in a form where he can draw on them at need cannot do better than to select a bank of recognized good standing and leave them there in full confidence of their safety.

BITTINGER.

The records of another year are closed forever and we are face to face with the possibilities and responsibilities of another. Men will resolve today and tomorrow forget their resolutions and so through another year of doing and undoing we will go and the world will grow better as time goes on.

Howard Shoup and Master Johnny Keller arrived here last week from Crown Point, Florida, and are at the home of Mr. Shoup's sister, Mrs. Oliver Buckle.

Oliver Buckle and Dennis Brenneman hold the belt as champion fox hunters, they having gone out one day recently and brought in three red foxes.

The holiday week was very quiet in our little village. A blizzard was raging through out most of the week and at one time roads were blockaded with snow.

G. N. Emory, of Romney, W. Va., passed last Sunday evening with his son at this place.

Two infant children, one of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Glotfelty and the other of Mr. and Mrs. William Smith, both of Jennings, were buried at this place last week, one service being conducted by Rev. Samuel Miller, of Engles Mills, and the other by Rev. Young, of Salisbury, Pa.

The ladies of the Lutheran congregation at this place held an oyster supper last week and realized a small profit which sum will be used for the benefit of the church.

Answered the Last Roll Call.

Freeman L. Friend died at his home in Bethany, Mo., Nov. 19th, 1906, at 11.30 o'clock a. m. He was born in Allegany county, Maryland, Sept. 8th, 1824. He was 82 years, 2 months and 11 days old at the time of his death. On the 29th day of October, 1847, he was married to Miss Rebecca J. Smalley. Ten children were born to this marriage, eight of whom are still living and all were present at the funeral. Besides the bereaved wife there are the eight children, seventy-one grand children and thirty-four great grand children. He leaves only one sister, Mrs. Mary Chisholm, of Gorman, Maryland, out of a large family of brothers and sisters.

He removed from Maryland in 1850, and settled in Keokuk county, Iowa, near Sigourney. He remained there until 1861, when he again moved to Decatur and Ringgold counties, Iowa. In the spring of 1861 he came to Missouri, as he had traded for a farm just south of where New Hampton now stands in Harrison county. Those were perilous times, as the war spirit was at fever heat in Missouri. The man he traded farms with was ordered out of the state because he was a union man. In our community the disloyal element was largely in the majority and the life of a loyal man was constantly in danger. His first service was in what is usually called the Craynor raid, when Col. Jeff Patton started south with his company of Confederate soldiers organized at Gentryville in Gentry county. Patton was threatening Iowa with an invasion before he went south. This act called down the wrath of all loyal men in north Missouri and under the command of Col. Craynor, of Albany. Patton was driven south when he entered the southern army. In the fall of 1861 at Bethany he enlisted in what is commonly known as the enrolled State Malitia under Capt. S. C. Allen, and after about six months of arduous service he again enlisted in Co. G, 6th Missouri State Militia Cavalry. This company was mostly made up of Harrison county boys, some of whom are still residents of the county. The regiment was gradually worked south, and at the time of this narrative were in charge of the post at Harrisonville, in Cass county. On Nov. 3rd, 1862, the following soldiers of Company G, were detailed by Col. E. C. Catherwood, commanding the post as a guard for a government wagon train from Harrisonville to Warrensburg in Johnson county. Those men composing the detail were Lieutenant William Newby, in charge with F. L. Friend, James Harkness, Henry Williams, J. K. Irvin, W. G. Hogan, R. L. Nelson, Wm. Watson, Geo. Keeley, Joseph Hunt, Thornton L. Sullivan, J. L. Oxford, David Todd, J. L. Weese, H. P. Brewer, Alford Allison, J. R. Hosier, Timothy Rose, Chas. Swim, Joshua Belford, John Ratliff, Ed. Fish and Perry Allen. When this escort was only 12 miles out from Harrisonville they were attacked by Quantrill's entire command of about 300 guerillas, which was composed of such men as the James and Younger outlaws. Those bushwhackers were never known to give quarter to union soldiers. After a very gallant and stubborn resistance in which Tim Rose, Chas. Swim, Joshua Belford, John Ratcliff, Ed Fish and Perry Allen lost their lives, together with five of the teamsters—names unknown—killed, Lieutenant Newby ordered a retreat back to Harrisonville. In their flight the guerillas succeeded in capturing Newby, Friend, Harkness, Williams and Irvin as prisoners of war and those soldiers were taken along by the rebels as they started south. The balance of the command of union men returned to Harrisonville after several were wounded by the rebels in pursuit and Col. Catherwood at once started at the head of a large force to punish the enemy. The rebels were overtaken that night and after a running fight of near two miles they succeeded in recapturing two of the prisoners and killing a number of the bushwhackeas. Those two were Lieut. Newby and J. K. Irvin. This still left F. L. Friend, Jas. Harkness and Henry Williams in the hand of the enemy. Those three were taken some fifty miles from where they were captured, and just before sundown Nov. 4, led off from the road and shot. Harkness and Williams were killed. F. L. Friend was shot through both eyes, which blinded him for life. This wound never healed and about 16 years ago a very malignant cancer developed. This cancer was the direct cause of his death. He was totally blind for over forty-four years. In his darkness and misfortune he bore it with patience and fortitude. His enlistment proved for life as he never again saw the light of day, neither the flag he had done so much to protect. His greatest consolation, through life was that he had only done his part to his country well.

His religious experience commenced last spring or summer and was a remarkable one. He had long known his duty to his Creator and wished for a manifestation of love from the One who is the Light of the World. While meditating on this great subject he heard as it were a voice speaking to him the words of Jesus found in the 7th chapter of Matthew and the 7th verse, saying, "Ask and it shall be given you. Seek and ye shall find. Knock and it shall be opened unto you." Immediately his soul was at rest and sweet peace was his comfort and stay. He was received into the M. E. church by the pastor, Rev. E. P. Reed. His wife had long been a loyal and faithful member of this church.

The funeral services were held at the residence, Nov. 22, 1906, conducted by Rev. E. P. Reed, assisted by Rev. A. N. Cave. The pall bearers consisted of old comrades, principally members of his old company. His remains were laid to rest in the beautiful Miriam cemetery, where they await the last roll call and Him who does all things well.

Ancient Craft Elect Officers.

The annual election of officers of Oakland Lodge No. 192, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons, occurred last Thursday evening when the following were chosen: Worshipful Master, Capt. John M. Jarboe; Senior Warden, Norman S. Heindel; Junior Warden, Julius C. Renninger; Secretary, Dr. Benj. F. Selby; Treasurer, Ephraim J. Fringer. The Deacons are appointive officers and will be named at the next regular communication.

Card of Thanks.

We desire to sincerely thank the members of the Presbyterian church for their gift of the beautiful buffet, which was delivered at our home on Christmas eve.

Also all our other friends, many of them outside of the church, for their many tokens of love and esteem. Among these we especially mention the editors of the Oakland papers.

To one and all, we wish a happy New Year.

In all this Mrs. McClelland joins me.

Sincerely,

JOHN A. MCCLELLAND.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is:

AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside business, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

Consumption

¶ There is no specific for consumption. Fresh air, exercise, nourishing food and Scott's Emulsion will come pretty near curing it, if there is anything to build on. Millions of people throughout the world are living and in good health on one lung.

¶ From time immemorial the doctors prescribed cod liver oil for consumption. Of course the patient could not take it in its old form, hence it did very little good. They can take and tolerate it for a long time. There is no oil, not excepting butter, so easily digested and absorbed by the system as cod liver oil in the form of Scott's Emulsion, and that is the reason it is so helpful in consumption where its use must be continuous.

¶ We will send you a sample free.

¶ Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

Miss Jennie Johnson went to Frostburg this morning to visit friends a few days.

Mr. G. C. Stowers, of Hyndman, Pa., was in Oakland this morning on business.

Dr. R. A. Ravenscroft, of Baltimore, spent a few days in Oakland last week on business.

Mr. Harper Bartlett is holding a temporary position in the Oakland post office as clerk.

Mr. DeWarren H. Reynolds, prominent attorney of Cumberland, was in Oakland yesterday on business.

Mrs. John D. Taggart and daughter, who spent a few days in Pittsburg with friends, have returned to Oakland.

In Cumberland last Friday a marriage license was issued to Charles Alexander Hesen and Pearl Kildow, both of Oakland.

Mr. Luther J. Brown, vehicle dealer, received yesterday a car load of sleighs, sleds and buggies which will be sold cheap.

Dr. E. H. Bartlett left Oakland last Thursday to visit one of his daughters, who resides near St. Louis, Mo., for a short time.

Each year the poultry business is becoming more lucrative in the community. The old hen is getting worth her weight in gold.

Mr. Wallace Frazee, of Selbysport, who spent holiday week with his sister, Mrs. Austin Brown, returned to his home Saturday afternoon.

Mr. George W. Fleming, of Fayetteville, N. C., who came to Oakland last Friday on business, returned to his home Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. E J. Frantz and daughter Mrs. John Sweeney, went to their old home at Selbysport yesterday evening to visit relatives for a few days.

Mrs. E. M. Spedden and two children, of Crellin, were in Oakland last Saturday going from here to Grafton where they are the guests of relatives.

Mrs. D. E. Offutt went to Cumberland Tuesday to attend the funeral of her sister, Mrs. John C. Brady, who died at her home near that city on Monday.

Mr. Ray White, of Grafton, who is just recovering from an attack of the grip, is home for a visit of a few days to his father and other members of his family.

Economy Merchant E. A. Weimer, by advertisement appearing today in this paper, makes some large reductions in clothing for men, boys and women.

Mrs. Harry Matheny and Mrs. Olin F. Durst, of Lonaconing, who were here as guests of relatives for a few days, returned to their home last Saturday morning.

Mr. and Mrs. Percy Procter, who have been spending the winter in New York and other eastern cities, will leave Washington in a few days for the Pacific Coast.

Misses Leah Bolden and Mamie Hart went to Meyersdale, Pa., this morning, called thence by the illness of Mrs. Albert Bolden who is suffering with typhoid fever.

Dr. A. J. Mason, 'Squire Leon Hardie, A. J. Frazee and R. M. Holman, all of Friendsville, were in Oakland last Thursday evening where they attended the meeting of the Masonic lodge held that night.

Merchant W. C. Jones, of Deer Park, accompanied his son Charles A., to Oakland land Friday when the junior Jones took the train for Delaware, Ohio, where he is attending Wesleyan University.

Miss Rebecca Thayer, who spent the holiday season with her parents in Oakland, left for Calvert, Md., yesterday morning, where she will resume her duties as instructor in the high school at that place.

A note received Monday from Rev. W. H. Faust, Baptist minister at Deer Park, conveyed the information that he would leave that place this week for Lexington, Ga., where he will have charge of a pastorate.

This paper is anxious each week to issue a spicy and interesting local page. If each of our subscribers would hand us in one news item, what a newsy paper we could issue. Try it for a few weeks and mark the change.

A man in a neighboring town, who took a city paper in preference to a country paper because he got more paper for the money, was attracted by the advertisement of a fire escape which would be forwarded on receipt of $2. He sent the cash and in a few days received a copy of the New Testament.

Mrs. D. E. Offutt returned to Oakland last Friday from Baltimore where she had been for two or three weeks with her daughter Miss Nell, who underwent a serious surgical operation in one of the hospitals of that city. Miss Offutt's condition is very much improved and her ultimate restoration to health is confidently expected by her friends and relatives.

By the explosion of a lamp in the office of Mr. John T. Mitchell, located on the second floor of the Garrett National Bank building, on last Monday evening, slight damage was done the walls of the room. Mr. Mitchell was in another part of the building when the lamp let go but returned to his room and succeeded in extinguishing the fire before it had gained headway, otherwise the damage would likely have been considerable.

Faulty work in the construction of the roof of St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church has resulted in considerable damage to the inner walls of the building by the water bursting through the conductor pipes and running down from the ceiling to the basement floor. This week false work was constructed on the roof and new gutters put in which changes the course of the water to the rear of the building and no further trouble is anticipated from this source.

People who are charged with a good supply of bad whiskey will do things which they would shun to do in their sane moments as they would to put their hands into the burning fire. Men are transformed from respectable citizens into demons and will commit depredations that they will regret all their lives and the disgrace of which will follow them as long as life lasts. Why will they so far lose all self respect as to give themselves over to the demon drink?

Many of the young men of Oakland and other sections of the county who spent the holidays with relatives and friends at home, have returned to their respective schools. Among those who left Oakland yesterday were Philip Peddicord, Ralph Thayer and Ernest Ashby, for Western Maryland College, Westminster; Paul Naylor, for the West Virginia University, Morgantown, and Milton Sincell, for Gettysburg College; Miss Rose Mitchell, for Mary Baldwin Seminary, Staunton, Va.

An Illinois editor retired from journalism and his "good-bye" is chronicled in the following language: The undersigned retires from the paper with the conviction that all is vanity. From the hour his paper was started to the present time he has been solicited to lie on every given subject, and can't remember having told a wholesome truth without diminishing his subscription list or making an enemy. Under these circumstances of trial, and having a thorough contempt for himself, he retires in order to recruit his moral constitution.

Mr. Robert E. McQuay, general manager of the Maryland Lumber Company, a new corporation which was chartered recently by the Circuit Court for this county, departed for the west Tuesday afternoon on business connected with his company. The officers of the corporation are Dr. J. Gilbert Selby, of Eglon, president; Dr. Benj. F. Selby, of Oakland, secretary and treasurer, and Mr. McQuay, general manager. The capital stock of the company is $5,000 fully paid up. The object of the corporation is to manufacture and deal in hardwood lumber of all kinds.

A slandering tongue is more to be dreaded than the most loathsome reptile that crawls upon the face of the earth for he will give warning before he strikes you—but a slanderer never. Let a man or woman start on the downward road to ruin and we are all prone to step aside and cry out, "slide on, slide on, to destruction." Instead of stretching out the hand of brotherly love and staying their progress, we stand by and let them slide. He who can stoop down and lift up his fallen brother from the mire and place him on his feet and whisper sweet counsel in his ear and bid him go and lead a better life, is truly a benefactor to the race.

Christmas Festival of Anderson Chapel Sunday School.

The drilling, practicing and preparation of weeks by members of the Anderson Chapel Sunday school, of Swanton, culminated Monday evening, December 24th, 1906, in a flattering success. In the fullest meaning of the term this was a typical Christmas Eve, with the winter temperature of our mountain heights intensified, and just enough snow to make sleighing tempting. A light snow was falling, and the outside air was crisp and searching but within the chapel walls all was glowing, bright and happy. Indeed the walls had almost disappeared behind their embellishments of evergreens, festoons, wreaths and numerous artful shapes evidencing the work and finish of cunning hands. Young eyes with Christmas in their flames ran in delight over the long rows of tables and receptacles ladened with the most choice delicacies for child and man.

A well devised and most creditable programme announced that the entertainment would begin at 7.45 p. m., but in advance of that hour the seating capacity of the church was packed by children and a goodly number of representative citizens paying the high tribute of the most respectful attention. To follow the range and diversity of the order of proceedings delightfully relieved and interspersed by music applicable to the festal season would impose an unreasonable encroachment upon space for this publication, but the entertainment was highly successful and enjoyable in every feature and department.

Six gold-star medals were presented to the six pupils ranking nearest perfection in the scholastic requirements of the year and about fifty presents and prizes were awarded.

It was stated by the superintendent that the mother church of this school was founded on our American Continent with the earliest English settlement at Jamestown, Virginia, in 1607—thirteen years before the Pilgrim Fathers left the shores of Europe for Plymoth Rock. That those adventurers built a stockade and then an Episcopal church in which the famous Indian beauty, Pocahontas, married John Rolfe about the year 1614, and in their second church in 1619 the first Congress ever held on American soil assembled; and that in 1639, nineteen years after the arrival of the Pilgrims at Plymoth, they built their third church of brick with a stone tower, a part of which still remains as the oldest piece of masonry reared by the hand of man in this great land now of more than eighty million of people.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By the Garrett County Teachers' Association.

The plan of having articles published each week relative to the public schools, which was set forth in THE REPUBLICAN last week, is meeting with the hearty approval of the teachers throughout the county. A large number are now preparing articles upon the subject of education which will soon be published. Many replies have been received, and the spirit of enthusiasm displayed in the responses encourages the Teachers' Association in its work of creating a new interest in education throughout Garrett county.

The following letter is being mailed this week to every teacher in the county:

To the Teachers of Garrett County:

The Garrett County Teachers' Association is exceedingly anxious that you will help it in its efforts to arouse a new interest in education in this county. In order to do this there are three departments of our system which will have to be improved: the teaching force will have to be better fitted for its work; the parents must be urged to give more cooperation to the teacher; and the trustees must be urged to take a more active part in the work of their schools. By having articles from time to time published in the county press, it is hoped that the parents will cooperate more with the schools than they do now, and in the same way it is thought that the trustees will be spurred on to do more for the school which is under their charge. Better schools will never come until they are demanded by these two factors in our system. And everyone feels confident that the newspaper articles will arouse the trustees and the parents so that they will take more interest in our schools.

But the teacher, who will help him in this advance movement? He must help himself. The Association is providing an opportunity for the instructor to fit himself better for his work, by having articles published each week, in which teachers give and receive inspiration and ideas in their work. Will you embrace this opportunity for self-improvement? Will you contribute any good idea which you have found to be excellent in your work in the school room? The best wins a prize of $5.00. And will you before January 15th, return the enclosed postal, after having signed your name and having obligated yourself to read the articles published in the county papers?

"The success of this venture depends upon your cooperation. Take part in this work of the Association as you would have the trustees and parents take part in the work of your school. Join the movement of advance and answer at once.

The following article has been received for publication in the series:

A DAY IN SCHOOL.

It may be helpful to some one to have related the work of one day in my school. The teacher should be the first to arrive at the school house, unless there be a janitor.

The first ringing of the bell, even a hand bell, should be at some stated time before the opening of the school. The pupils should be trained that the second ringing of the bell means prompt assemblage and perfect quietude. At this time the day should be dedicated by devotional exercises. This devotion should be brief, well adapted, and always most reverential to Him who "doeth all things well."

A word as to the nature of these morning exercises. We teachers need to be exceedingly discreet here from an educational standpoint. We should feel a deep sense of our responsibility in shaping the plastic spirits of those in our care. We should endeavor to impress upon them that all good centers in the Divine Mind, and must emanate from God. Hence, it follows, that a teacher should take her religion into the school room, but sectarianism never.

As a form of exercises, I suggest that after all are quiet, the teacher tap the call bell for all to stand and render a short song, after which all bow their heads and engage in silent meditation and prayer, the close of which should be indicated by the teacher again tapping the call bell, whereupon the pupils quietly seat themselves. All this should be done in deep reverence, otherwise we might miss the real object of the devotion. Occasionally the entire school should repeat the Lord's prayer. This would break the monotony and still retain the highest ideals.

The day thus introduced, the program of recitations should begin, each branch receiving an allotted time, the length of which should be governed by the nature of the study. But when the period expires, the recitation should close, so as not to encroach upon the time of the next. "Robbing Peter to pay Paul, does not work in school at all."

If the daily program is followed up in this way, as far as practicable, the pupils will unconsciously systematize their study work at home as well as at school, and thus be brought to appreciate the value of an opportunity—which to-day is our greatest lack.

When four o'clock has come, the work of the day is completed, and the teacher is ready for the roll-call and for a cheerful dismissal. Thus we may prove the truthfulness of the adage, "A clear setting of the sun makes a bright tomorrow."

CONTRIBUTION NO. 1.

A Good Institute.

The literary and local institute at Accident as programmed for the 21st and 22nd of December was a pleasing success.

On Friday evening the program was well rendered. Prof. Browning adding much to the interest of the occasion.

We've never witnessed a more respectable audience and better order at this place, which speaks well for the good people of Accident and community.

On Saturday at 9.30 a. m., about thirty or forty teachers with a number of other friends of education met in the public school building for regular institute work.

The devotion of the morning was conducted by Commissioner Bishoff in a most reverential manner.

In the absence of President F. E. Rathbun, Supt. E. A. Browning was chosen chairman of the meeting. He at once assumed the duties of this office and a delightful and practicable program was rendered. Many beautiful thoughts were given and tangible suggestions were made by Prof. Browning and teachers of the county.

The teachers present took a most interesting and active part in the work of the day, a very commendable thing for the young teachers to do! In this respect, at least, we have made a much needed improvement in our institute work.

Prof. Herbert Browning, of Friendsville, and Prof. Alvin Loudermilk, of Deer Park, were present and rendered efficient service.

The address by Dr. Hudson on "The Moral Side of Education" was greatly appreciated.

The splendid talks by Prof. Kim. Welch and others booked for the afternoon session were omitted on account of adjournment at one o'clock.

Judging from the interest taken by teachers and friends present we believe that the problem of local institutes is being rapidly solved—the credit for which largely belongs to the influence of the Garrett County Teachers' Association.

J. C. BEAHM.

Heating Plant Out of Commission.

The boiler which supplies heat at the public school building in Oakland was put out of commission during holiday week by the freeze, which burst every section of the boiler and many of the water pipes leading to it, necessitating the installation of new apparatus at a cost of about three hundred dollars. As a result of the breakdown the public schools will not reopen for the after-holiday session until Monday of next week.

IN MEMORY OF EMANUEL CUSTER.

BY HIS CHILDREN.

His busy hands are folded,
His work or earth is done;
His trials now are ended,
And a heavenly crown he's won.

"Weep not for me, dear children,
It would cause me pain;
Trust in Him who took me from you,
And in heaven we'll meet again."

When you ask us do we miss him—
Yes; it fills our heart with pain;
But his spirit softly whispers,
"Weep not, in Heaven we'll meet again."

Fold his hands in silent slumber—
For his work on earth is done;
In his dream he saw the Master
And He beckoned him to come.

"Let Well Enough Alone" Is Un-American

...By...
United States Senator
A. J. BEVERIDGE of Indiana

"LET well enough alone" is not AMERICA'S motto. That maxim would have kept every law of the last five years off the republic's statute books. "Let well enough alone" never sent a pioneer into the wilderness, NEVER BUILT A RAILROAD, never set upon the ocean a single ship, never invented a machine. Columbus sailing into the unknown seas flew no such ensign; no such spirit burned in the hearts of the ragged Continentals who chose VALLEY FORGE AND ITS HORRORS rather than home and its joys. No law securing the rights of man would have been written, NO STEP IN HUMAN PROGRESS ever been taken, no discovery of science ever been made; we should today have no telegraph, no telephone, no steam or electric railways, not one of our thousands of modern comforts, had these words of reaction been written on American hearts. Not "let well enough alone," but "MAKE BAD BETTER AND BETTER BEST"—this is the real motto of Americanism. "Make bad better and better best"—let all American school boys and girls put that at the top of their copy books.

Today the new laws we have written are nothing but the working out of a NEW PRINCIPLE which our complex social and industrial order has developed, just as every new principle has similarly been developed in the past.

That principle is the life and reason for the railway rate law, the pure food law, the meat inspection law, the employers' liability law and, greatest of all, the law creating the department of commerce and labor. That principle is this: When any business becomes so great that it AFFECTS THE WELFARE OF ALL THE PEOPLE it must be regulated by the government of all the people. The people cannot permit SOME of them to practice methods hurtful to ALL of them.

AND THE PEOPLE HAVE NO AGENCY FOR THEIR PROTECTION EXCEPTING ONLY THEIR GOVERNMENT.

The day of railroad and corporate power in American politics is drawing to its close. The CONSCIENCE OF THE MILLIONS is ending railroad and all corporate interference in the people's government. Any man who is nominated for any office, from president down, by railway or corporate influence ought to be overwhelmingly defeated, and hereafter such men WILL BE defeated. Laws are being placed on the statute books making railway and corporate interference with free government a CRIME. More laws will be added until every railway and corporation corrupter of primaries, conventions, legislatures and congresses who thus corrupts the people's government will find himself BEHIND THE BARS of the people's prisons. And there is where he ought to be. Every man who on behalf of any corporation or on his own behalf spends a dollar to corrupt free institutions ought to be sent to jail, for in a republic the worst of crimes is attack on the LIFE of the republic.

AND THAT CRIME IS ALL THE WORSE IF THE HAND THAT STRIKES THE BLOW BE A HIDDEN HAND AND THE DAGGER IT HOLDS BE OF GOLD.

Modern Ethical Ideals

By President HADLEY of Yale

THE man whom you could trust to help a weaker neighbor will nevertheless go to all lengths to hurt a weaker COMPETITOR for money or for office. A man who in private life would despise snobbishness and servility of every kind will IN BUSINESS OR POLITICS cringe to the stronger power for the sake of his own PERSONAL advantage.

No wrong was ever stopped by this talk of men who objected to that wrong chiefly because SOMEBODY ELSE got the benefit of it.

Liberty, democracy and constitutional government are each in their places invaluable means to the public interest. Liberty is essential to progress; democracy is needed to prevent revolution; constitutional government is requisite for that CONTINUITY AND ORDERLINESS OF LIVING without which no law is possible.

But when any one of these principles is made not a means, BUT AN END, which justifies its use in the interests of class instead of the general interests of society it becomes a MENACE instead of a protection.

LIBERTY FOR EACH MAN TO SERVE SOCIETY IN HIS OWN WAY IS GOOD. WHEN IT IS USED TO JUSTIFY HIM IN DISREGARDING THE INTERESTS OF SOCIETY IT IS INADMISSIBLE.

Democracy is right when used as a means of keeping the government in touch with public opinion. It is wrong when it encourages a temporary majority to say that their vote, based on insufficient information and ANIMATED BY SELFISH MOTIVES, can be identified with public opinion concerning what is best for society as a whole. Constitutional safeguards are absolutely necessary to make any measure of liberty or democracy possible, but when they are used to protect the liberties of A CLASS BENT ON ITS OWN INTEREST rather than as a means for the general interest of society they cease to become a safeguard and become a means of peril.

Infant Prodigies Are No Better Than Idiots

By Professor F. ELY of Drake University

INFANT prodigies are NO BETTER THAN IDIOTS. It is better to be the sluggish, plodding man with the hoe than the long haired, sensuous man with the bow. Music and art are fine things when diluted with a little football and a little wholesome reading and sleep, but the man whose faculties are developed IN ONE DIRECTION ONLY cannot fail to be unstable and a crank.

MILL FEEDS.

Profitable Use in Changing From Grass to Dry Food.

Increasing attention is being given by intelligent farmers and stock keepers everywhere to the use of concentrated feeds, mill stuffs and similar substances. This is so because such attention almost invariably yields a handsome return. The old haphazard methods of feeding are giving way to more careful, more practical and therefore more scientific methods. It is becoming more common to raise clover, alfalfa, pea vine, horse bean or cowpea hay, so as to have dry fodder or roughage rich in protein to supplement the ordinary hay and grain fodder which are relatively poor in protein, but rich in starch and woody fiber.

Grains, mill stuffs and ground feeds are also being employed with more intelligence and greater profit than in former years. Where the protein containing hays above mentioned are not grown it is entirely practicable to balance up the rations of ordinary hay, corn fodder, corn grain, etc., by feeding suitable proportions of any of the high grade concentrates, such as old or new process linseed meal, cottonseed meal, gluten feed, gluten meal, etc. Of course in beginning to feed these concentrates it is important to start with a relatively small quantity per cow per day and increase the allowance as the creature's condition and product warrant. Special care is necessary in this matter at this season and when the cows change from grass or green feed to the dry feed of winter.

One of the safest mixtures to use at this critical period is corn, oats and barley, ground and mixed in proper proportions.

When these grains are finely ground, concludes American Agriculturist, and the resulting feed is kiln dried the feed seems to be more digestible and is certainly very appetizing.

GARDEN HOES.

Several Sorts of Hoes Convenient For Various Purposes.

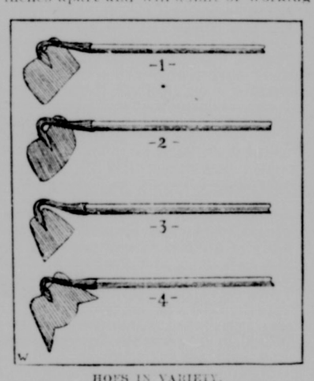
For general use in the garden I like a business hoe, one that is wide, so as to cut over a large surface or move a good lot of soil at each stroke, and sharp, so as to cut deep and easy. A good file ought to be kept near at hand. But we also want hoes that can be used in weeding and especially in weeding onions grown by the transplanting method. They stand several inches apart and will admit of working among them with a narrow bladed hoe. I used to take an old, well worn hoe, one practically past its usefulness, and cut the blade down at both sides, so as to leave it from corner to corner only two or two and one-half inches wide, and the corners themselves at an acute angle, says a writer in Farm and Fireside. As to the new style hoe, it is surely sharp and I believe of just the right form to be serviceable for use as a weeder in onions and other close planted stuff. In short, with hoes of the right kind it seems to be not much of a curse to be "the man with the hoe."



HOES IN VARIETY.
(1, Light and sharp; 2, worn out hoe cut down for weeds; 3, onion hoe; 4, new style.)

Rhubarb May Be Divided.

If rhubarb is to be divided it should be done in the autumn and not left to the spring, when the plants should be doing their best work. Cut so each bud will have a good piece of root, and set with manure below the soil on which the root rests and manure above the soil covering it, the rain and snow of winter will do the rest. Later, if early outdoor stalks are wanted from established roots, a tall box or barrel should be put over each root with straw over the plant and a good wall of well rotted manure inside the inclosure. There will probably be a good growth of tender stalks in the early spring.

Winter Turnips.

Good mellow ground is best to use for turnips, but almost any kind will do. Plow up a piece of oats stubble or pull your onions and cultivate that up. Be sure your ground is harrowed down well. Select a good winter variety of turnip seed. I think the winter purple top the best. Mix a ten cent package of seed in a half gallon of dry ashes and sow the whole broadcast over the ground, harrow in lightly, and if there are good fall rains you are assured of a good crop of turnips.—Missourian.

The Mealy Wheat.

From experience and rather wide observation, a writer in an exchange thinks it may be affirmed that the much praised mealy wheat is likely to succeed on sandy clay or loam soil of some elevation, but that on bottom land and rich black loams some more universally acclimated variety is more likely to prove a success.

Dont write him anything by hand that takes him time to make out—that may leave him in doubt—that he can't easily read.
And don't fill out legal papers or card memos—or make out accounts of hotel menus in your own handwriting.
It looks bad, reflects on your standing, makes people think you can't afford a stenographer, and is sometimes ambiguous.
You can write out your letters—make out an abstract—fill in an insurance policy—enter your card memos—make out your accounts, or a hotel menu—or do any kind of writing you need, on any kind, size or thickness of paper, and space any way you want on

The Standard Visible Writer.

You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.

High Art and Hairpins

By IZOLA FORRESTER

Copyright, 1898, by Izola Forrester

"Mr. Asquith is out by himself yet," said the tailor who had his shop on the ground floor of — Wasaih, for figure. He held the door half open, and Helene paused with one foot on the narrow flight of stairs leading to the studio. She was frankly disappointed to have come so far for nothing. She hesitated, glancing back doubtfully at the waiting cab.

"Did he say when he would be back?"

"He not ever say when," answered the tailor positively, with sweeping Hungarian assertion. "He goes, then he comes again. The door is open."

"Then I think that I shall wait." Helene smiled with sudden pleasure. "I am sure he will come soon. He must have expected me and left the door open."

"Sure he must," agreed the tailor cordially. It was entirely probable. If there had been the slightest chance of the descent of such a radiant young goddess as this he had no doubt but what Mr. Asquith lived in a state of perpetual expectancy.

Helene went quickly upstairs. At the second flight there was no landing. The top step ended abruptly at a door, and the ceiling sloped in an angle to meet the top of the door. She lifted the old fashioned latch and looked in, her heart beating faster. The studio was empty.

For an instant she hesitated. She had never been in his studio. It seemed like an intrusion into some intimate, personal part of his life in which she, with all his love for her, had no share.

But because of that very privacy she wanted to intrude. She wanted to see how he lived, here in his own little den where he did his work, the work that was to win him fame and fortune before the world, the den where he dreamed his dreams of the future in which she had so great a share.

She pushed the door farther open, lifted her soft light skirt of silk higher from the dusty stair and went into the studio, closing the door after her.

It was a half ceiled attic, the nearest approach to a Parisian atelier that Asquith could find in New York. There was a skylight in the high peaked roof, and wide, heavy cross beams visible to the naked eye marked the eaves line.

There was no burlap on the walls, no Turkish rugs on the floor, no Dutch shelves nor steins, not even a taboret or samovar. It was simply a workshop. A huge black walnut easel stood crosswise, facing the north light. Before it stood a rush bottomed chair and a low table littered with brushes, paint tubes and half mixed colors. A dingy, well daubed blouse lay over the back of the chair and a pipe half smoked rested on the easel ledge. Helene saw it all at one glance and laughed joyously, tremulously. She had never felt herself so near to him as now. What a boy he was, after all, and how funny he must look in that old blouse. She sat down in the rush bottomed chair and leaned her head back against the sleeve of the blouse.

The walls were bare except for half finished charcoal and pen and ink studies, with here and there a water color. The black and white studies were strange to her, but the landscapes all bore the same straggling signature, Hugh Asquith.

That was all. Not a single Venus, not a cast of anything in sight. Asquith was strictly a landscape artist and did not paint the figure. Vaguely she had been pleased that he did not. Of course if one were devoted to art and must paint the figure, then one must have models, and models must necessarily be beautiful, and—

Right there Helene's logic ended, but it was sufficient. She was glad that Asquith was a landscape artist and did not require any model save old Mother Nature.

She drew off her long mousquetaire gloves with a sigh of content. On the third finger of her left hand sparkled a diamond. It had been there over a month now. With a sudden impulse as the gloves slipped to the floor she pressed the ring against her lips. It stood for so much—more than a mere engagement. They had known each other a long time, two seasons, and she had met him every winter at dinners and swell dances. But this summer it had been different. Asquith said it was fate. Helene thought it the most delicious bit of maneuvering love had ever managed.

The rest of the family had gone to Europe. Helene had hesitated. Between an automobile tour of Brittany and the Baltic coast and a quiet summer with her married cousin at Larchmont she had chosen Larchmont. Asquith was a member of the yacht club at Larchmont. Every morning from the broad veranda at Bayview cottage she could see him out on the rocks, sketching before sunrise.

They were splendid rocks, huge, gaunt and gray; they rose raggedly from the water at low tide, like the bodies of some submerged sea monsters. One could walk to them easily, stepping over little pools left by the tide and stray strands of seaweed, and one morning Helene walked to them, slim and sweet and fresh as the dawn in her white dress and white low shoes. It was the shoes that did it. When Asquith turned at her call for help he found her standing in one of the pools, and the white shoes were ruined.

Helene glanced up at the wall. A little water color hung near her, some gray rocks in a rose tinted sea, with a bit of salt marsh in the foreground. She smiled at it happily. They had sat up there together that morning, and she had taken off her shoes and stockings—the precious ruined shoes and stockings—and that had been all.

And Asquith had said it was fate.

She laughed again. He was such a boy, after all. She stopped to pick up her gloves and stopped short to look at something lying on the floor at her feet. It was merely a hairpin. She picked it up and looked at it curiously. Her own hairpins were brown tortoise shell ones to match her hair. This one was gold, a small, insidious gold wire affair, very cheap and very dainty.

The laugh was gone from her lips. In its place was a look of wonderment, of almost fear. There had been a woman in Hugh's studio, a woman with blond hair, who wore gold wire hairpins, who dropped gold wire hairpins around promiscuously. And Hugh had told her he never painted the figure. More than that, he had told her that no one knew of his den in the attic except herself and a few close friends. He had no patrons, no buyers of pictures, because as yet he had never sold any. All of his relatives were in Europe too. If the hairpin did not belong to a model, whom did it belong to?

With a sudden fierce impulse, she threw the hairpin away from her. It fell with a tiny clink against the wall. Almost instantly she had repented. After all, it was purely a personal affair with Hugh, in which she had no part. He had not expected her to visit his studio. She had no right to resent another element of femininity which she had found there. Even if he did have models it was probably necessary. All artists had to study from life sooner or later. But was it necessary that they should have hair that matched gold hairpins?

She arose and crossed the room to where the hairpin had fallen. For a moment she held it in her hand irresolute. Then slowly she laid it on his table, and beside it she left the new solitaire ring. It would be enough. She knew that he would understand. As she turned to the door her eyes filled with a sudden rush of blinding tears, and as she felt for the latch it lifted and the door opened.

It was not Asquith. On the landing outside stood a girl, plump, rosy cheeked and red haired, holding up her skirts in one hand and a pail of scrub water in the other.

"Oh, I thought Mr. Asquith was home," she said apologetically. "I just cleaned up his place, ma'am, and I guess I lost one of my hairpins. It's a little wire one, but I need it to keep my pug up tight."

"I laid it on the table," said Helene gently. The girl set the pail down on the stairs and secured the hairpin, fastening up her tumbling red curls with it deftly.

"Thank you, ma'am," she called as she went downstairs, and Helene went back to the table and slipped the ring in its old place just as Asquith came up the stairs.

Booth and the Fish Line.

Of Edwin Booth Mr. Whitney relates the following anecdote: "In fishing he would exhibit the impetuosity of a Petruchio, and this cost me several rods, which broke into smithereens over small trout. He got in one day from a neighboring town a new, fairly good bamboo fly rod, which I assisted him in setting up, arranging the reel and line and pliable soaked leader, and left him afterward noosing on a scarlet ibis. The rod was lying on the dining room table. I was no sooner out of the rooms on the porch when I heard a tremendous rumpus in the dining room and, entering, found Booth flying about the room like a madman. He had left his fly hanging over the side of the table, which the half grown family cat present, seeing, struck at with its paw, which the sharp hook caught in, and the frightened cat bolted under the table with rapid speed, breaking the rod tip and dragging the rod after, while Booth, crying "Scat, cat!" had no effect on the now crazed feline, which he was following after in great excitement at high pressure with adjectives of singular note. The sequel of this was the escape of the cat with the gaudy fly well hooked in its foot, and a well smashed up rod. I was too much convulsed, with the others drawn in by the commotion, to render any aid, and Booth soon joined in with our laughter, confessing that his fishing experience was a failure and that he would not have any more of it."—Forest and Stream.

FROM HORSE CAR TO THE TROLLEY

Story of the Wonderful Development in Electric Traction During the Past Twenty Years.

PASSING OF STEAM TRACTION

Gradual Elimination of Distance Through the Development of the Electric Locomotive--Chicago to New York in Ten Hours.

During the summer of 1887, there appeared in the New York Sun the following facetious news item:

"They tried an electric car on Fourth avenue yesterday. It created an amount of surprise and consternation from Third St. to One Hundred and Seventeenth St. that was something like that caused by the first steamboat on the Hudson. Small boys yelled "dynamite!" and "rats!" and made similar appreciative remarks until they were hoarse. Newly-appointed policemen debated arresting it, but went no further. The car horses which were met on the other track kicked without exception, as was

That was less than twenty years ago. Today the New York Central Railroad Company is expending $50,000,000 in the electrification of the first thirty-five miles of its system, and the car horses were long ago relegated to the boneyard, if not to the "sausage factory."

"They" have done marvelous things since the increasing knowledge of electricity opened up a new world of achievement, and we have scarcely crossed the threshold. In 1880 the electric car was a dream; in 1890, an experiment; in 1900, a great and wonderful fact which is revolutionizing passenger transportation and will enable human beings to move from place to place twice as fast as they do at present.

Born in Old Vermont.

When in 1834 Thomas Davenport, of Brandon, Vt., ran a toy motor mounted on wheels on a small circular railway, the modern electric railroad with its possible speed of over one hundred miles an hour was born.

In 1838 Robert Davidson, of Aberdeen, Scotland, built an electric locomotive which actually reached a speed of four miles an hour on the Edinburgh-Glasgow railway. Nine years later Professor Moses G. Farmer operated an experimental car which carried two passengers at Dover, New Hampshire.

Then the United States congress became interested. By special grants Professor Page of Smithsonian institute was aided in the construction of several forms of motors. One of them was used as a locomotive and, driven by a battery of one hundred Grove elements, was tried April 29, 1851, on a railroad running from Washington to Bladensburg. A speed of nineteen miles an hour was developed, so great that it destroyed the batteries.

Numerous other experiments followed, all commercial failures because the motors were crude and the source of power a primary battery. The development of the wonderful modern dynamo was necessary before electric railroading could become a commercial success. The first great step was in 1869, when an Italian named Pacinotti invented a continuous current dynamo. Three years later the first practical commercial machine for continuous current operation was made by Gramme.

Still the modern electric car was impossible. The "reversibility of function" had yet to be discovered, involving electrical transmission of energy through two machines, one driven by power and generating electricity; the other reversing the operation, receiving electricity and developing mechanical power.

Like many other important discoveries, this is said to have been the result of accident. A workman coupled a machine to a live circuit by mistake and was greatly astonished to see it begin to rotate. This reversibility of function was publicly demonstrated for the first time at the Vienna exposition in 1873.

Not until 1879 was the first electric railway put in operation, taking the current from a dynamo, using a modern motor and carrying passengers. This novelty was in operation at the Berlin exposition and was a mile and two-thirds in length. The train consisted of a small locomotive and three small cars, capable of carrying twenty people. It reached a speed of eight miles an hour.

About this time Stephen D. Field and Thomas Edison in the United States began experimenting. In 1880 Edison was operating at Menlo Park an electric locomotive which pulled two cars.

The First Electric Railroad.

The first regular electric line to be established was at Lichterfelde, Germany, near Berlin. It was only a mile and a half in length and opened for traffic in May 1881. The trains carried twenty-six passengers, at a maximum speed of thirty miles an hour.

The first electric car to be operated regularly in the United States was installed by Deft on the Hamden branch of the Baltimore Union Passenger Railway in August, 1886. That was barely twenty years ago. So great as the skepticism of the public and railway men generally that the contract under which the road was built withheld payment one year so that it might be determined whether the cars would run. "No one but a knave or a fool would undertake such a thing," said a well known scientist at the time. Scientists sometimes have trouble keeping up with the procession. About the same time small cars were operated by Van Derpoele at South Bend, Ind., followed by other small roads in Edison Electric Locomotive Operated Experimentally at Menlo Park, 1880.

Windsor, Canada; Appleton, Wis.; Port Huron, Mich.; Scranton, Pa., and Montgomery, Ala. In the autumn of 1884 Frank L. Sprague, whose name is inseparably connected with electric traction, began to attract attention with his motors.

Twenty Years of Achievement.

At the beginning of 1887 there were in the whole world less than sixty miles of electric railroad track, and only about one hundred motors and motor cars. In 1905 there were nearly thirty thousand miles of electric track in the United States alone.

This change was not accomplished without opposition, discouragement and financial difficulties. Mr. Sprague himself, who was so potent a factor in working this change, has told the story of his first important contract. In the spring of 1887, the Union Passenger Railway company of Richmond, Va., engaged him to build an electric railway. The first car was run out one night while the skeptical people slept, to make sure it could climb the hills. It started out in a blaze of glory and ignominiously was towed back again by four big mules. But Sprague persisted until on Feb. 2, 1888, in a drizzling rain, the road opened for business.

From that time forward the future of electric railroading was assured and events moved rapidly. City after city adopted the new motive power; horse cars became things of the past; interurban roads began to gridiron the country everywhere, and in each instance a commercial success was scored. Electric interurban lines have been money makers from the start.

The greatest development has been in the east; but the west is not far behind. The Aurora, Elgin and Chicago Electric railway (the third-rail system) which has been in operation several years, is famous. From one central power station over two hundred miles of road are operated, or will be as soon as the line to Belvidere is completed. Electricity at wholesale is sold to cities and villages along the route for lighting purposes; electricity for power is sold to farmers. Trains of elegant cars run into Chicago at a speed which would have seemed impossible a few years ago. Passengers wave good bye to steam trains on a paralleling railroad, which they pass easily. A parlor and dining car is one of the luxuries which the suburbanites enjoy going to and from the city, and the railroad seems a veritable gold mine for its owners.

The horse car has long since disappeared. Will the iron horse, the great steam locomotive, be supplanted also? This question occurs to all who can see the significance of passing events. Probably not for many years to come, as far as heavy freight traffic is concerned, because steam is especially applicable to the hauling of freight. But the action of the New York Central in electrifying thirty-five miles of its road leading out of New York, and the popular agitation for similar improvement in Chicago and elsewhere, would seem to point to a time not far distant when electric railroads will connect distant cities and greatly shorten the hours of travel.

Chicago to New York in Ten Hours.

In fact such a railway already is being built between Chicago and New York by the Chicago-New York Electric Air Line Railroad company, of Chicago. This company, headed by a group of practical railroad men, proposes to run limited trains, making not more than three stops, through to New York or Chicago, in ten hours. The thought fairly takes one's breath away at first, but the project considered soberly seems practical enough, and certainly is "a consummation devoutly to be wished." The work of grading began Sept. 1 near LaPorte, Ind.

As the new road will be an air line, with few curves, the route surveyed is 100 miles shorter than the Pennsylvania "Short Line", and 230 miles shorter than the Lake Shore and New York Central, each of which runs trains covering the distance in eighteen hours. Taking into consideration the shorter route of the Air Line, this is equivalent to a fourteen-hour service. With low grades, a straight track and no grade crossings, the seventy-five miles an hour average necessary to a ten-hour service ought easily to be maintained. Even on the first class steam roads of today ninety miles an hour is not uncommon for short distances.

The Scientific American of Feb. 18, 1905, speaking editorially of the New York Central experiment, says, "The success of this installation, of which there can be no doubt whatever, marks the first step in the gradual substitution of the electric for the steam locomotive on the operation of long distance express trains." The Chicago-New York project may be regarded the second step.

Mr. Sprague himself says that speed is "a matter of finance." "What then will determine the future?" he asks. "Chiefly the financial factor, as it must the future of any other great industrial problem. When savings in operation and the increased return for traffic will more than pay a fair dividend on money invested for electrical equipment, will trunk lines be operated by electricity."

Professor Charles P. Steinmetz, one of the greatest authorities on electricity, is quoted as saying, "There is no limit to the speed that may be developed in electric traction—that is, there is no limit up to 150 or 200 miles an hour. Higher speed than that the car wheels could not stand. They would fly to pieces from centrifugal force. Not only can a speed of 120 miles an hour be maintained on a train equipped with electricity, but in my opinion it is an entirely feasible scheme from the commercial point of view."

"At any rate, the world seems on the eve of great things, and no scientist dares say today as was said twenty years ago, "a man is a knave or a fool." The attitude of the American public is one of faith and expectancy, best expressed by a recent remark of an old lady in her last sickness:

"I don't want to die," she said, "I want to see what they are going to do."

HUTTON.

Miss Jennie Faherty is visiting friends in Baltimore.

HOYES.

The Christmas entertainment in the M. E. church was a success, and reflects credit upon those who gave it their support. Highest honors are due to the faithful committees who carried the work through in such a heroic manner.

At this writing, the church is making preparation for watch night services.

The directors of the Garrett Co. Telephone Company held a meeting here Thursday last.

The teachers' institute at Accident Dec. 22nd, was attended by several people from this community. They report an interesting and instructive meeting.

It gives us pleasure to report that the schools of this section seem, in general, to be making good progress. May the corps of faithful teachers continue in their energetic work!

Among the teachers who have come home to spend their vacation are: Misses Elizabeth, Edna, and Eva Welch; Olia Mattingly, Dessie Callis, and Mr. Alvin Lowdermilk. Several others who are teaching near home are spending their vacation here also.

Miss Hazel Poland, teacher of the Bishoff school is at her home at Westernport during the holidays.

Miss Ethel Welch, a student of Western Maryland College, spends Christmas as this place.

Mrs. A. P. Enlow, Mrs. Jos. Keller, and Miss Ollie Cuppett are on a visit to friends at Layton, Pa.

Miss Sadie Friend leaves this week for school at Keyser, W. Va., where she will continue her course in music.

Miss Bertha Dewitt has gone on an extended visit to her sister near Johnstown, Pa.

Mr. Wm. E. Bishoff, of the Frostburg Normal School, is home for the holidays.

Mr. William Glotfelty, of Underwood, spent a few days with friends at this place recently.

Mr. Roy Custer has gone to Baltimore to begin his studies for a commercial life.

Misses Olia and Bernadette Mattingly, and Messrs. Arthur DeWitt and Alvin Lowdermilk spent an evening with friends at Engle Mills a few days ago.

Miss Bertha Custer has been with relatives at Grafton for some time.

Mrs. Ellen DeWitt, who has been very ill for a few weeks, is slowly convalescing.

Mrs. J. M. Lowdermilk was sick several days last week.

Thos. H. Cuppett and J. M. Lowdermilk spent Sunday at McHenry with their sick friend, Mr. Brison Welch, who is suffering from a stroke of paralysis.

JOHNNY JUMP UP.

Only one week ago we were listening to the jingle of the sleigh bells, but the beautiful left us about as rapidly as it came and now we have an abundance of mud to contend with.

The Christmas entertainment at the M. E. church at this place was well attended and greatly enjoyed by both old and young.

Mr. John Kirkpatrick returned home last Monday after spending some time at Deer Park.

Miss Sadie Friend left Hoyes Wednesday for Keyser, W. Va., where she will again enter college.

Miss Ethel Welch returned to Westminster College Tuesday. She was accompanied to Oakland by her sister Edna who was on her way to Barton where she is teaching school.

Mrs. Ellen Dewitt is improving at this writing and we hope will be able to be out soon again.

Miss Bertha Dewitt left this place last week for Landstreet, Pa., where she will spend an indefinite time with her sister, Mrs. R. R. Friend.

Miss Freda Dewitt spent last Sunday with Auburn Smith.

Mr. Abel Dewitt accompanied by Mr. Harvey, spent one day last week in Hoyes.

Messrs. Alvin Lowdermilk and Arthur DeWitt were guests of Misses Olia and Bernadette Mattingly Monday evening, and we understand they watched the old year out and welcomed the new year!

Mrs. Alvin Friend, of Sang Run, was shopping in Hoyes one day last week.

The directors and other officers of the Garrett County Telephone Co. held a business meeting at this place one day last week.

Miss Dessie Callis and her brother Charles were visiting relatives in Mt. Lake Park a few days the past week.

Mr. William Bishoff, who has been attending school at Frostburg, spent the holidays at his home at this place. He will return to school Saturday.

We will close our letter by wishing all readers of THE REPUBLICAN a happy and prosperous New Year.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,

44 5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

Resigned as Manager.

Mr. William H. Chadderton, of Deer Park, who has been manager of Altamont Springs Farm for the past ten years, tendered his resignation as such some time ago and on Tuesday it was accepted by Col. Truesdell, the proprietor. Mr. Chadderton will for the present devote his attention to his own beautiful farm lying one mile east of Deer Park and adjoining Col. Truesdell's place. Mr. Hugh H. Calderwood, the chief shepherd at Altamont Farm, will be Mr. Chadderton's successor as manager.

K's of P. Elect Officers.

Garrett Lodge No. 113, Knights of Pythias, on last Friday evening elected the following officers to serve for the succeeding half-year: Chancellor Commander, Fred. J. Schroeder; Vice Chancellor, Norman S. Heindel; Prelate, Ernest Townshend; Master of Work, Charles A. Deffinbaugh; Master of Finance, A. Totten Matthews; Master of Exchequer, Samuel Lawton; Master at Arms, William D. Dixon; Trustee, Truman West; Team Master, Henry Lauer. The lodge is in a prosperous condition numerically as well as financially and is adding strength at every meeting.

Dwelling Burned.

The story and a-half house located on a lot owned by Mr. Richard K. Maroney on the back road to Mountain Lake Park, was burned last Sunday evening about eight o'clock. For several months the house has been untenanted and it is the supposition that some one entered the building and carelessly threw a lighted match among some rubbish in one of the rooms. The house was uninsured and its loss amounts to about $300.

High Temperature.

The thermometer at eleven o'clock this morning registered 59 degrees F., which is remarkable for this season of the year.

County Commissioners in Session.

The Board of County Commissioners met on Tuesday of this week at the board office in the court house for the purpose of appointing road supervisors and constables for the present year. At the time of going to press no appointments had been announced by the board, but it is expected to have the complete list for publication in these columns next week.

HANGED HIMSELF IN BARN

Mr. W. H. Chadderton, of Near Deer Park, Took His Own Life Thursday Night.

The news of the death of Mr. William H. Chadderton, for many years one of the highest respected residents of Deer Park district, came as a great shock to his many friends throughout the county when announcement was made on Friday morning that he had taken his own life by hanging himself from a beam in his barn the evening preceding.

Mr. Chadderton had been in ill health for a year or more and in a letter written to his wife and only son just before he committed the act he gave this as the reason.

For ten years he was manager of the Altamont Springs Farm, owned by Col. George Treusdell, resigning his position on Tuesday, the 1st inst., being succeeded by Mr. H. H. Calderwood, the chief shepherd.

Religiously Mr. Chadderton was a strict Baptist, being an official member of that church at Deer Park and was looked upon as one of the best citizens of the community. He had accumulated considerable property, being the owner of a magnificent farm near Deer Park and a number of pieces of real estate within the town's limits.

His body was discovered hanging in the barn by his wife, who felt anxious over his absence from the house and made a search for him. Her screams aroused a young man who works on the farm and running to Mrs. Chadderton's assistance they cut the body down and summoned help.

A coroner's jury was impaneled by Justice William D. Hoye composed of Messrs. William B. Miller, George Marley, Samuel P. Specht, M. V. Flanigan, Hugh H. Calderwood, F. L. Friend, G. J. Walter, H. L. Friend, W. W. Thrasher, E. R. Clark, J. S. Browning and J. W. Walter, who upon making inquiry into the matter returned a verdict of suicide. Dr. J. K. Cole, of Deer Park, made an examination of the body and found that Mr. Chadderton's neck was broken and that his death was instantaneous.

His remains were shipped on Friday night to Maple Grove, near Pittsburg, Pa., for interment, being accompanied by the deceased's widow and son, and Mr. William B. Miller.

Mr. Chadderton was born in England and came ts this country while still a young man.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

A teacher is not to teach history, arithmetic and spelling—he is to teach boys and girls.

One of the best educators in this country said in a recent address that one of the best ways to inspire students with energy is to have the school room well ventilated.

The County Commissioners when the last levy was made assessed the taxpayers of the county $16,000 towards the support of our schools. There are other sources which also contribute to the expenses of the school system.

Several contributions for publication have been received from teachers throughout the county. Among them are the following:

TEACHERS NOT PREPARED.

I think one of the great drawdacks to the schools of Garrett county is that the large portion of the teachers begin to teach a class without having studied the lesson and having gotten from it some one idea. I know this to be true in a great many instances. I am unable to understand how any teacher can conduct a class successfully and yet not have reviewed the lesson. The duty of the teacher does not stop with only the reviewing. Before the lesson begins, and especially with the advanced classes, the teacher should formulate some plan by which the subject matter of the lesson shall be presented. In each lesson there should be some idea to be learned, and the teacher should study out beforehand what it is, how that idea shall be given so that everyone of the members of the class will not fail to get and retain it. However, this article is becoming too long. I must put into execution the principle I laid down in this article: there should be only one idea to be conveyed in each lesson, and that that idea can be secured only by the teacher working with the lesson before the recitation is to begin. Unless there is some one idea in mind to be conveyed, a large number of ideas will be touched upon which will not be made emphatic and therefore, they will not be remembered. Such teaching as that is scatteration, and scatteration is never teaching.

CONTRIBUTION NO. 2.

HOW TEACH U. S. HISTORY?

I have several in mind which I intend to contribute before the series is closed. However, in this article I would like to know some way by which Montgomery's Facts in History can best be taught to the students of this county, or at least in my school. I find them unable to recite by topics. I have a way I have found fairly successful, but possibly some other teacher has a better. I have been reading to the class and telling them stories and illustrations as I read; and on the next day I question them on what I read to them the day before and find they get along fairly well by this method. I think, too, that my students look at the history recitation as one of the most pleasant of the day; I account for that by saying I always try to make it a pleasant period, and at the same time very profitable to them. Does any other teacher have a better way to teach this subject.

CONTRIBUTION NO. 3.

HOW TO USE PARTICIPLE CORRECTLY.

I have a home-made rule for teaching the correct use of the perfect participle and find it excellent. It is as follows: The participle is used only when it is accompanied by some form of the verb "to be," have, had, has, or when one of these words is understood. The forms of the verb "to be" are: is, am, was, are, art, were, wert, be, being, been.

I give a few of the irregular verbs in their principal parts, and later use them in sentences which illustrate the rule laid down for the use of the participle. It naturally follows, and can be so taught, that when one of the words given in the rule is used with the verb, that the past tense should not be used.

| PRESENT | PAST | PERFECT PARTICIPLE |
| sing | sang | sung |
| come | came | come |
| write | wrote | written |
| eat | ate | eaten |
| see | saw | seen |

Examples: The lady has sung a song; not, the lady has sang a song; or, the lady sung a song. The letter is written. The man has come; not, the man has came; nor, the man come. In the following sentences, one of the words given in the list is understood and can be inserted and not alter the meaning: The apple was seen eaten by the teacher; in full, it reads, the apple was seen to be eaten by the teacher. The actor walked across the stage, seen by the audience; in full, it reads, the actor walked across the stage, being seen by the audience. If this rule and principal are drilled thoroughly into the minds of the students as well as the teacher's, it will be found to be excellent in teaching the correct use of the participle, and will tend greatly to purify from errors the language of the students.

CONTRIBUTION NO. 4.

INSTITUTE PROGRAMME AT SUTTON.

Under the auspices of the Garrett County Teachers' Association, the teachers will conduct an institute at Sutton in the Pope school house Jan. 26, 1907.

Goosebone Markings.

Since the retirement of old Elias Hartz from the field of goosebone prophecy, in which he was long the undisputed master, the forecasting of winter weather conditions from the markings of the goosebone has been done by the disciples of Hartz after earnest consultation. They do not venture to predict the weather intricacies in such detail as was Hartz's custom, but they agree on general points.

The breast bone of a fine goose, hatched last spring, has been taken as the basis of their prognostications. The dark blotches on the bone are understood to indicate cold weather, varying in intensity with the strength of the marking, and the lighter portions represent mildness and warmth. The bone is carefully charted off in sections to represent the months of December, January, February and March.

This year's bone thus shows mild weather for the early part of December, and severity at the end of the month. January will open cold, but at the close there will be a mild spell, extending into February. Then there will be another wintry spell, followed by March storms. The spring will be a late one.

George Folmer, of Reading, Pa., the "dead leaf" weather prophet, who is sixty-nine years old, has issued a proclamation on the winter, as follows:

"If the leaves of certain varieties of fruits trees die and drop off before December 5, we can expect a soft or a comparatively mild winter, with cold snaps now and then. If the leaves still cling to the branches on or for a short time after that date the winter will be between very cold and mild. If the leaves on the trees for some weeks after December 5, then we can look for a very severe season. I've seen leaves on trees in the middle of the winter which were as green and fresh as in summer. But the temperature was for the most part at zero and below.

"The leaves had fallen from the trees I observed, before this last December 5, and we can expect a very moderate winter during 1906-1907. I'd advise the owners of dams to start housing when the ice gets to be eight or nine inches thick, or it will melt away from succeeding warm spells.

"I've been basing weather prophecies on this indication for the last five years, and my prognostications have been infallible every time. I am sure that my present predictions will be found correct. The indians foretell the state of the winter weather by this sign."

Real Estate at Auction.

To-morrow morning in front of the court house door Mr. E. A. Weimer, late County Treasurer, will offer at public aution a number of pieces of real estate upon which the taxes are due and in arrear.

Zachariah Hendrickson and family have removed from Eglon to the property in Oakland recently purchased by Mr. Lewis Bash from Mr. Percy Procter.

THE FRANTZ-LISTON CASE.

A Correspondent Reviews the Case and Says a Precedent Has Beeu Made.

To the Editor of The Republican.

The people of Friendsville and vicinity are extremely anxious to know why there has been nothing done in the case of Charles Liston who shot and killed Lupton Frantz in this town several months ago.

This crime seems to have been committed without cause or provocation, so claimed by the victim on his death bed, and we as citizens of Garrett county would like to know how a grand jury could dispose of a case of this kind so easily. As the writer understands the law no one having an interest in the matter can serve as a juror and that the prosecuting witnesses are the only ones allowed to appear before the grand jury.

This being the case we would like to inquire why it was that Liston was before the jury, being informed that he appeared before that body.

It seems to be a very easy matter for an indictment to be found against one who shoots a pheasant, but a human life can be sacrificed and it does'nt seem to make any difference.

I have been informed that the Council of Friendsville gave Liston instructions concerning Frantz. It is proper for an officer to defend himself while making an arrest or in the discharge of his duties, but in this case we fully believe that Liston was not engaged in the discharge of his duty as an officer at the time of the shooting, he being behind the bar of a saloon here and Frantz in front when the words which led up to the shooting are alleged to have been passed between the men.

While on his death bed Frantz stated that he never dreamed that it was Liston's intention to shoot him, the statement being made in the presence of Rev. Lister.

In disposing of this case in such a summary manner is setting a very bad precedent to our young and rising generation. Our boys will be impressed with the fact that Liston shot Frantz, went clear without even a trial, and will ask themselves the question: "Why can't I kill this fellow who is not doing the right thing by me?"

Remember, citizens of Garrett county, that we all have boys and relatives to respect and to bring up as upright and honorable men and women, and therefore I say that a very bad precedent has been set in the case above referred to.

Slight Damage by Fire.

A one story frame dwelling in the rear of Mr. John W. Hart's store on Third street, caught fire Tuesday morning from an overheated flue, which communicated to the walls of the kitchen. The flames were extinguished by the occupants of the house.

A HERCULEAN TASK.

Vault Doors Failed to Respond to Lock and Had to be Drilled.

A lock-out at the Garrett National Bank in Oakland occurred on last Saturday which resulted in considerable inconvenience to the bank officials but demonstrated beyond the question of a doubt the security of the vault.

The trouble preventing the officials getting at the money and securities of the bank occurred on last Friday afternoon after business hours when Mr. Jones, the cashier, threw the combination of the inner vault doors, intending to return later in the evening to completed certain work which has been his custom for a number of years. His surprise cannot well be imagined when after half an hour's work with the combination it failed to respond and the door remained closed. After exhausting every method to make the lock work a telegram was sent to the factory where it was made for a man to come on equipped to drill the door if necessary. The workman arrived on Sunday morning from New York and after making a minute examination of the condition of the lock he was convinced that the only way of gaining access to the vault was by drilling a hole through the door at a certain point and with a punch destroy the lock which would allow the bolts to work. With this determination work was begun about eight o'clock Sunday morning and after ten hours of constant drilling a hole three-quarters of an inch on the outside and half an inch on the inside was made, through which a punch was inserted and with a blow of a hammer the work was practically completed. The damage to the vault door was repaired by the insertion of a steel plug which was hardened with a blow lamp and salt water, making the plug even harder than the door itself.

The door drilled by the workman is 1½ inches thick, being less than half the thickness of the outer door. With all the approved appliances used by the workman and the experience derived by years of such work a burglar would stand but little show of getting through the steel plates protecting the vault, which speaks well for the security offered by this bank to its depositors and patrons.

The International Sunday School Lesson.

First Quarter. Lesson II. Genesis i, 26; ii, 3. January 13, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

Man Made in the Image of God.

Genesis is essentially pictorial. It is a radiant panorama. For the end intended, its scenic method could not have been surpassed. The motive of the book is to reveal the reality, personality, and power of God; to show the material universe as an expression of His mind and a creation of His will; to make plain to him, man's own constitution and his relation to nature and to God. For the the purpose to be conserved the form is singularly effective. When all is said and done by way of criticism, the book will still command respect. Theories concerning authorship and inspiration may be altered or discarded, but Genesis will never lose its hold upon the universal human heart.

The most remarkable content of the book is the thought of God in the creation of man. The radiant enunciation of this is the rarest jewel in this casket of gems. It is of practical and priceless value. With dramatic vividness the Father of the World is pictured as coming to a halt in His creative work. In the last of the great and long epochs, He pauses as if to seperate and give special distinction to what He is now about to do. The fact that it is the last in order indicates that it is pre-eminent and climactical. The change in the creative formula is also significant. The "let be" used seven times is now changed to "let us make"—it is the "plural of majesty."

It is as if God is solomnly announcing to Himself His intention of creating a vicar who shall visibly represent Himself upon the earth. A being is now to be made who shall be like God. One with whom he can commune at pleasure, and one who by his intelligence and will shall bring everything, animate and inanimate, to its best estate. It pleases Him to create man in a dualism: male and female creates He them. He ordains their multiplication and commissions them to "have dominion." With the solicitude of a father He indicates the kind, quality, and abundance of food prepared for them. And now for the seventh time God spreads His hands in benediction over all His works. In the seventh epoch there is cessation from creative work, and God Himself gives an an object lesson and example of respite from toil.

The Teacher's Lantern.

All that precedes in this story of Creation is preparatory to man. Separation of light and darkness, waters above and beneath, creation of sun and moon, of life animal and vegetable, all is an orderly approach to man as the crown of all.

* * * * *

This is assurance of the dignity of man's station and the worth of his being. It is his coronation at the hand of his Creator.

* * * * *

What constitutes man's likeness to God? It can not be anything in physical nature, for God is Spirit without body. The likeness inheres in man's moral and intellectual faculties. He thinks, wills, loves. This power, not shared by any other creature, makes him to "lack little of being God."

* * * * *

Comradeship was in the mind of God in the making of man. God wanted company.

* * * * *

"Likeness and image" is simply rhetorical. It is not two different meanings but duplication of the same meaning for emphasis.

* * * * *

Man's dominion over nature was never so great as at the present day. With retort, spectrum, and telescope he is wresting nature's secrets from her and subduing her forces to his use. The universe affords a limitless arena for man's skill and prowess.

* * * * *

We have to talk of God as if He were a man. Such is the limitation of language. So the narrative speaks of God as resting, although He can never be weary. His rest was exemplary.

HAVE YOU "SWORN ON."

The following from the Fairmont Times is just as applicable to Oakland as it is to Fairmont, and all business men to whom it applies would do well to heed the advice contained therein:

Mr. Business Man, a word with you. This is generally known as "swearing off" season, but sometimes the things which we "swear off" are not so important as those we "swear on." We would not be so bold as to even intimate that you have found it necessary to swear off anything, but we wonder if, in looking back over the past year, taking a retrospective view of your successes and your failures, you have not seen places where you might have done better. If you are progressive—and what Fairmont business man is not?—you have resolved to do a bigger business in the year 1907 than you did in that whose books are now forever closed; you have resolved to win more customers to your store and strive in every way to hold those you have already won. That is the way the up-to-date business man starts the new year and it is equivalent to a resolution to advertise more forcibly and more persistently than ever before. It is "swearing on," and if that resolution is faithfully kept you will see the results in the shape of dollars which you could never hope to garner from an unadvertised business. This sort of "swearing on" is particularly timely now. The big holiday season is over, it is some little while before the spring rush will come and the foolish merchant will think it not worth while to keep the buying public aware of the fact that he is still in business. That merchant has not "sworn on." His farsighted competitor sees that if he ever needs the assistance of printers' ink in directing the steps of customers to his store it is in the dull season, and he will keep up his publicity attacks with trip hammer force and persistency. He is the one who will get the trade and the profits, while the one who practices a misguided economy will see the dust gathering on his stocks and his clerks sitting in idleness. There can be no let up in the advertising campaign, if you expect to win in the race for patronage—you must keep the people fully informed three hundred and sixty-five days of every year that you have the best to be found anywhere and at prices that are right. Let them forget for a day or a week and the chances are that someone else who has kept his name and his business constantly before them will gather them in. It is persistency that wins. If you will but "swear on" persistency and forcefulness in your publicity department for the new year you will have no cause to worry about the "swearing off."

BILLS THAT BECAME LAWS.

Tuesday Began the Life of Several Important Acts.

January first marked the beginning of the life of several legislative acts of Congress important alike to the nation as a whole and to the citizens of the District of Columbia. These are the free alcohol law, the pure food law, the anti-pass section of the Interstate Commerce law, the modification of the navigation laws to simplify enrollments and licenses, and a law with reference to the licensing of druggists in the District of Columbia.

The pure food law contemplates the barring from interstate commerce of foods that are injurious to health. Today the man who buys his liquor by the bottle should know what he is getting if the law is enforced. The man who takes his in a glass over the bar is taking chances.

This is one of the theoretical effects of the new pure food law. There is no money yet wherewith to enforce the new law, but $250,000 will be shortly forthcoming, and then the Department of Agriculture will put out a force of inspectors and buy samples in the open market to ascertain whether or not the packages of food and drink correspond in ingredients with their labels.

Several months have already been given the dealers in which to adjust themselves to the new conditions. Many of them have done so, but there is a remarkable idea afloat among a good many dealers that the law will not be effective till next March. Such dealers are liable to be picked up by the inspectors and heavily fined, for the department wants to strictly enforce the pure food law, and will make an example of some dealer at the first opportunity.

The sole object of the law will be complied with if the food and drug packages sold are labeled that they show the real constituents of the package, so that there is no reasonable necessity for the consumer to be deceived as to what he is buying. The free alcohol law is intended to assist farmers and smaller users of power to have a fuel that in efficiency and cost shall be cheaper than gasoline or kerosene.

All the regulations for the enforcement of the law have not been framed, but they soon will be. There are efforts being made to have the law so enforced as to enable the farmers to run small stills on their farms, as is done in Germany, and get the benefit of all the cheap fuel and power they can with the least trouble and red tape possible compatible with a reasonable enforcement of the revenue laws.

The anti-pass provision of the interstate commerce law forbids common carriers, directly or indirectly, giving interstate free tickets or passes for passengers, except to their employes and families, the agents of the carriers and their surgeons, physicians and attorneys, to persons engaged in religious and charitable work and to certian other specified classes.

HE WAS LIKE A MODERN NERO.

Career of "Robber Governor" of South Carolina—Death Recalls Queer Story.

One of the most picturesque and complete scoundrels this country has ever known came to the kind of miserable end that might have been expected for him when Franklin J. Moses was suffocated yesterday in his room in a boarding house near Boston. He was one of the few men we have known who seemed to be devoid absolutely of moral character, or even a suggestion of honor of any kind. Physically, he gave no indication of his inward state. In his younger days he was rather a handsome, well appearing man, with a keen, clear-cut and kindly face and pleasant manners, some dash and occasional flashes of what amounted almost to intellectual brilliancy. He never was devoid of physical courage, but would accept insults apparently because he did not have the moral sense to be ashamed, or to realize that there was honor to protect, or realize for resentment.

He was born of an old and well-establish family originally Jewish, and had every opportunity to be a gentleman. At the age of twenty-three his prospects were unusually good. He was the private secretary to Gov. Pickens, of South Carolina, received everywhere and recognized as promising, and his family was wealthy, his father being a lawyer of unusual ability, afterward chief justice of the Supreme Court in reconstruction days.

Frank Moses solicited, and by force of his official position obtained the privilege of hoisting the South Carolina flag over Fort Sumter after its evacuation by the Federal forces in 1861. He was eager to be spectacular and prominent, and wore one of the finest uniforms in the Confederate army. He was a dainty rascal in some respects and usually avoided active service, perhaps not because he despised exertion or personal inconvenience of any kind, and craved the neighborhood of vice. So he was gratifying his passion for that, he was not at all particular as to his company or surroundings, although he loved ease and luxury as fervently as a cat.

Probably he was the first of the very few young men of the South who deserted his people and race and went over to the radicals at the close of the war. So far as anybody could discover, he had no principles of any kind, political or otherwise. He never was cruel in his disposition, but probably if he had been in Nero's place he would have out-Neroed Nero, except he never would have been faithful to any woman three months at a time. He liked excitement, however, when there was no mess or labor connected with it; and, no doubt after he had exhausted the gambling hells of Rome would have roasted a few Christians or other unpleasant persons and given some score of citizens—especially such as had won money of him—to the wild beasts as a matter of amusement and interest without turning a moral hair or considering that what he was doing might possibly be wrong or disgraceful.

He threw himself into the saturnalia of vice, corruption, and debauchery, which came with the first reconstruction government, as a tired man throws himself into a warm bath. He gloried and luxuriated in it, and cared nothing how much public shame and hate he drew upon himself. He was elected a circuit judge, and sold decisions and used his office for the promotion of vice as carelessly and as much as a matter of course as if it was the natural and accustomed order of things. Then he was elected adjutant general and a member of the State legislature, in which latter body he promptly assumed charge and control of the negro members, who were fascinated by having a native-born white man with the appearance, name, and manners of a gentleman consort with them. Black or white, male or female, were all the same to Frank Moses. He led his gang of cornfield hands and village mulattoes upon the treasury in a series of grand and historic charges. They looted right and left and never ceased while loot remained. Moses himself seemed to steal for the very love of stealing and of riotous, indecent and expensive living. He saved no money to speak of, but scattered his plunder with a lavish hand. Anybody who might be used by him in any way could get money from him—usually in the shape of a warrant on the State treasury.

People who cannot recollect that time cannot conceive it. In the train of the male carpet-baggers who came flocking down on the carcass of the prostrate State, like so many vultures, there was a host of women camp followers and adventuresses, flashy, smart and wild, every one eager and ceaseless in pursuit of money, like all their kind. It is a matter of official record, we believe, that at a party given by some women of this sort in a notoriously and publicly disreputable house Frank Moses, then speaker of the house of representative, spent $1,500 in champagne in one night, and paid the bill with an order on the State treasury, signed by himself as speaker, for "legislative supplies." With this record, he was elected governor in 1872—"Our Young Native Governor" he was heralded by his negro followers at the time; "The Robber Governor," as he was called by the white people, and has been remembered ever since.

As governor literally there was no limit to his public and private, his official and his personal debaucheries and corruption. He gambled in public gaming hells, drank in public bars—although he never was a drunkard—consorted and drove about the principal streets of the capital city in open carriages with lewd women of all shades of color. He seemed to be absolutely devoid of the sense of shame. He sold pardons of the most notorious criminals, appointed the rankest and most ignorant blackguards to the noblest places for the most debasing purposes—purposes not to be named in print.

Even in South Carolina in reconstruction days there were limits. They were long, wide, and horrible, but Frank Moses broke over all. Probably one strong reason why he was not renominated was that his fellow thieves feared that another term for him would mean no more left to steal, and would discredit the boast of John Patterson—the carpet-bagger United States Senator sarcastically known as "Honest John"—that the State offers "five more years of good stealing." Other rascals with more pretense to the fact that the white people and property owners, when driven to the last wall, would take to buckshot and cold steel assisted in his overthrow.

He lurked and skulked about the State until the crash came in 1877. We believe he held some small office somehow, by begging, borrowing, blackmailing, and pilfering, he lived and maintained a good appearance and indulged in a limited degree his favorite and discursive vices. Then he passed out. He secured immunity by giving evidence against his associate rogues, who, in turn, were relieved from prosecution by the Democratic State government in exchange for the abandonment of the prosecutions against Democrats accused of fraud and violation in the elections.

Since then he has appeared from time to time in the newspapers as a prisoner in the courts of New York and Massachusetts, usually charged with some petty swindle or breach of trust and sufficiently serious to incur long imprisonment. He was aplausible talker and speaker, with some eloquence, and his favorite pose was to stand before the judicial desk, with bowed head and hands folded in front of him, and begin in a clear and not unmusical voice and good enunciation: "May it please your honor, I have done the State some service"—then would come a plea for pity.

He fooled the magistrates the first three or four times, but after this was convicted invariably, his expression that he had done the State some service losing the dignity of it amazing impudence when considered in connection with his career, and becoming a joke because the service he had done the State was recognized to have been performed in various jails and penitentiaries. He became known as an habitual criminal, with his picture in the rogues gallery; and now he is gone and the world is well rid of him.—Richmond News-Leader.

Blind Editor a Prodigy.

"A remarkable personality in Santa Fe," says Lillian Whiting in "The Land of Enchantment" (Little, Brown & Co.,) "is Colonel Max Frost, the editor of the New Mexican, the political leader of the Republican party and a man who, though blind and paralyzed, is simply a living encyclopedia of historic and contemporary events. At 8 o'clock every morning Colonel Frost is in his office, at his desk, dictating to three expert stenographers, carrying on three different subjects simultaneously. Instead of his blindness being hindrance to his work, he has by the sheer force of his remarkable energy transformed the obstacle into a stepping stone. 'I can do more work in ten minutes than most men can do in an hour,' he said in reply to a question, 'as to being blind, I have nothing to distract my attention. I put my mind on my work and keep it there.' Miss Whiting adds.

"Colonel Frost's experience is the most convincing testimony to the phenomenal power that lies in mental concentration. He cannot move without assistance. Physically he is a wreck. Yet he dictates columns of work daily. He is the most influential leader of the political party, and he is one of the makers of New Mexico. Every line of copy in his daily paper is read to him before it goes to press, and the vigorous and brilliant editorial page is largely his own work. For four hours every evening, Mrs. Frost reads to him from the great eastern dailies, the periodicals and new books. It is said in New Mexico that Colonel Frost has been the power behind the throne in territorial legislation since the time that General Lew Wallace served as chief executive in 1879."

Paroid Roofing—

—Read This Trial Offer on the Roofing That Lasts the Longest.

PAROID is the best ready roofing ever made. You can prove it, to your own satisfaction from a sample, but a better way is to use it.

All we ask is that you try it, and we make the way easy.

Here's Our Offer:

BUY one lot of Paroid; open it; inspect it; apply it to your roof, and if then you are not satisfied that you have the best ready roofing made, send us your name and address, and we will send you a check for the full cost of the roofing, including the cost of applying it.

Is there any offer we could make you fairer than that?

Could we afford to make such an offer if we were not sure that Paroid is better than other ready roofings?

It is better; we are sure; and this is why:

Four things enter into the making of a good roofing:

The felt; the saturation; the coating; and the method of laying.

Paroid excels on all four points.

The felt is the foundation. If it is not right to start with, no treatment of any kind can make it into a good roofing.

We know that our felt is right because we make it in our own mills (established in 1817.)

We make it because we cannot buy a felt elsewhere good enough for Paroid.

Other manufacturers who buy their felt in the open market—wherever they can get it cheapest—necessarily take big chances at the very start.

We couldn't give you the money-back guaranty we do if we did not make the complete roofing under our direct supervision.

Paroid roofing is not merely dipped in a solution, but is soaked in a water proofing mixture of our own, which renders every fibre of it—through and through—absolutely water proof.

And then the coating. Paroid is coated on both sides with a smoother, thicker, tougher and more flexible coating than is on any other roofing made.

There is no room for doubt about it. You need not take our word for it. Use your own judgment. Compare Paroid with other kinds. You will find that Paroid is the only roofing that doesn't break when you give it a short bend. If you can freeze the various samples you'll have a still better test, and you'll find Paroid the only flexible roof in a zero temperature, while others crack like an icicle.

But even the best roofing must be properly applied.

In every roll of Paroid you will find a complete roofing kit, with a supply of square, rust proof, water-proof caps. The only rust-proof cap made.

These caps are patented. You get them only with Paroid.

Being square, they give you larger binding surface and so hold the roof more securely.

Being water-proofed on both sides, they do not rust and work loose and cause a leak, as all other caps do, sooner or later.

And when the roof is laid, you not only have a good and durable, but you have a sightly roof. Its smooth, uniform surface, makes it the best in appearance of all ready roofings.

* * *

And there you are:

The best felt for a foundation;

The best and most thorough water proofing saturation;

The best and most flexible coating;

The most sightly ready roofing made;

And a positive money-back guaranty.

Will you try it on these terms?

There are some of the reasons why Paroid has stood the test of time for the United States Government, for railway, factory, farm and poultry buildings.

It lasts longest. It gives best service. And we stand back of it.

May we send you samples and prices?

JEFFERSON DAVIS' REGIME.

An Impartial Estimate of the President of the Confederacy.

I remember Jefferson Davis as a conspicuous figure in Washington for nearly half a generation before the civil war. He possessed none of the genial good-fellowship qualities which made Blaine the idol of millions of people. He was a striking personality· tall, slender, graceful in movement and ver courteous in his intercourse with those about him. He was a graduate of West Point, and served in the army from 1828 to 1835, when he resigned and devoted himself to a planter's life in Mississippi. While in the army he became engaged to a daughter of Gen. Taylor, and failing to get parental approval, an elopement and marriage followed, resulting in an estrangement between them that was never broken until after the battle of Buena Vista, when Davis as colonel of a regiment of Mississippi volunteers, gave heroic aid to Taylor in the victory that made him president of the United States.

Davis entered Congress in 1845, but before the close of his term volunteered to lead his Mississippi regiment to join in the army in Mexico. He thus vacated his seat in the House, but soon after the close of the war he was elected to the United States Senate and entered that body in 1848. In 1850, after the passage of the compromise measures, Davis steadily maintained his position, asserting the absolute sovereignty of the state. Mr. Foote, his associate in the Senate, supported the compromise measuses and resigned his seat in the Senate to accept the nomination for governor of Mississippi on the platform of the compromise measures as the final adjustment of the slavery dispute. When Foote took the field Davis was called upon by his friends to lead them in the contest for governor, and he also resigned his seat to make the campaign against Foote. Foote was an eloquent, dramatic and popular orator, while Davis, although vastly greater in intellectual force, was simply a great disputant, and Foote was elected by a small majority.

When Pierce came into the presidency in 1853 he made Davis Secretary of War, a position for which he was well fitted, and at the close of his term he re-entered the Senate, where he remained until January, 1861. The state of Mississippi had joined the confederacy, and Davis, in obedience to his devotion to state sovereignty, resigned his seat in a brief, pathetic and eloquent address. The confederate provisional congress met at Montgomery, Ala., and elected Davis provisional president by a practically unanimous vote. There was, however, a very active contest for the position, although Davis was not an aggressive candidate. When I had a protracted interview with him at his home in Mississippi in 1860, he stated that he had no knowledge of the purpose to make him provisional president of the confederacy. He was on his way to Montgomery when he received notice of his electiour He informed me that he sincerely regretted it as his great ambition was to command the confederate army. Howell Cobb of Georgia was very earnestly pressed for the presidency, but he had accepted the compromise measures in 1850, and as Davis was a very earnest supporter of state sovereignty, he was elected without seeking it, notwithstanding the earnest efforts made by Cobb to win the position.

I had a casual acquaintance with Mr. Davis before our civil war. For fully a decade before the fraternal strife began he was one of the most prominent figures and actors at the national capital. One of his distinguishing characteristics was his severe dignity of manner, both on the floor of the Senate and in personal intercourse with his friends. No member of the Senate was more highly respected by his fellow senators. He was a man of sincere and earnest convictions and all accorded to him the credit of being thoroughly honest and earnest in all that he said and did. He was one of the ablest of the southern senators and often participated in debate, but he was a stranger to all the arts of the demagogue, and his senatorial, like all his other addresses, were marked by uniform dignity and courtesy.

Davis was not a secessionist; on the contrary he sincerely deplored the severance of the Union and repeatedly expressed himself against its dissolution; but he most ably and firmly supported the sovereignty of the state as paramount to the sovereignty of the Union in all matters relating to the interests of the people of a state. He did not urge the secession of Mississippi after the election of Lincoln, and he occupied his seat in the Senate until Mississippi formally seceded from the Union, when in obedience to his convictions and teachings he obeyed the command of what he recognized as the sovereign power and resigned his seat in the Senate. He was surrounded by blatant fire-eaters who were studiously inflaming the south and offending the north by demanding secession in utter defiance of the national government. Davis was never guilty of any such expression, but when his state commanded him to sever his relations with the national government he obeyed because he believed that his first and only allegiance was to Mississippi. While there were men in the Senate who commanded a much larger measure of personal affection from their associates than did Davis, no member of the body commanded a larger measure of personal respect.

In 1880, some fifteen years after the war, I visited Jefferson Davis at Buvoir, a pleasant but unpretentious residence on the banks of the gulf that had been given him by some Mississippi friends as a permanent home. He received me with generous courtesy and I spent most of the day with him. I was surprised to find him in excellent physical condition when I had expected to meet with an embittered, despairing old man who had staked everything on the confederacy and had lost. When assured that no publicity would be given to any view he might express without his distinct approval, he discussed every feature of the war that I suggested to him with perfect frankness, and in the course of the conversation I learned for the first time the fearful force of state sovereignty as accepted by the southern confederacy.—Alexander McClure in World's Events.

THE CASH BOY TALKS.

His Father's Idea of the Delights of Municipal Ownership.

"Say, boss," remarked our cash boy this morning, "my paw is red hot for minniesickle ownership. I don't know what that is, but paw says everybody is going to own everything and divide up the profits. He was telling ma about it last night.

"Ma asked him where the people would get the money to buy those things, as they would cost millions of dollars.

"Paw said, 'Issue bonds.'

"'Yes,' said ma, 'but how will you pay the bonds when they are due?'

"'Issue more bonds,' said paw.

"'But how about the interest?' said ma. 'Won't you have to tax the people for that?'

"'Why, no!' said paw. 'Pay the interest with bonds.'

"'I don't see how you could do that,' said ma.

"'You don't, eh?' replied paw. 'Now, when we went to housekeeping, didn't I pay for all our furniture by giving a note, and when it came due didn't I give the man another note? You women know nothing about finance. You wait until the minniesickle ownership gets in power, we will divide the profits among the people, and no one will have to work. We will all be Vanderbilts. Won't you be proud of your hubby when he becomes part owner of all public utilities? You see, madam, there are some things you don't know.'

"And then paw looked wise. Ma stood and gazed at him for some time and then said:

"'Yes, there are some things I don't know, and one of those things is this: If there is a man more fit for the lunatic asylum than you, I don't know him.'

"Then I commenced to whistle 'Everybody Works but Daddy.' Say, boss, you see that lump on the back of my head? Paw has had that tune poked at him before, and I wasn't looking when his old shoe came flying my way."—Yonkers Statesman.

Bowser Gets Very Nervous

Physician Tells Him He Has Appendicitis, and He Asks Wife to Visit His Grave.

CALLS ON THE DRUGGIST

Chemist Laughs at His Fears, and He Goes Home and Devours Dinner He Refused.

[Copyright, 1905, by P. C. Eastment.]

MR. BOWSER didn't seem to enjoy his breakfast the other morning, and Mrs. Bowser, who took mental note of the fact, made up her mind that he should have a good dinner to make even. Knowing how fond he was of an old fashioned boiled dinner, she ordered corned beef, potatoes, carrots, cabbage and parsnips. The dinner was splendid as to quantity and quality, and it was with considerable pride that she announced the fact when he arrived home at 6 o'clock.

"A boiled dinner, eh?" he replied. "That's very nice of you, I'm sure; but, unfortunately for me, I cannot partake of it."

"But why?"

"I got a little warning today that I think best to heed."

"What sort of warning?"

"Dr. Macdready was in the office on some business, and, hearing me utter an involuntary groan as I rose up, he began to question me. It wasn't five minutes before he announced that I would have to be very careful or fall a victim to appendicitis. He said I had all the symptoms of it."

"I don't believe any such talk, Mr. Bowser. I haven't heard you groan, involuntarily or otherwise, for a year. Did he charge you a fee for telling you this?"

"He made no charge, but naturally"—

"Naturally you went and handed him over at least $5, while I am in need of a dozen different little things. You have no more cause to be afraid of appendicitis than I have of the Indian plague. Why do you let people work you like this?"

Knew It For Months.

"Softly, now—softly," he said as he led the way to the dining room instead of shouting "Woman!" at her. "Mrs. Bowser, I cannot be classed as an alarmist. Thousands of things have ailed me, and I have never said a word to you about them. I wasn't going to say a thing in this case; but, being put on a diet by the doctor, I had to make some explanations. I have known for months and months that the appendicitis was after me. I have figured that when it overtook me at last I would make a sneak for the hospital and have the operation performed before you knew anything about it. That is the way with me. I do my own worrying and planning."

"Well, what symptoms have you felt?" she asked.

"Pains in the back, roaring in the head, wakefulness and all that. There are days when black specks dance before my eyes. The other morning when I got up my teeth seemed too long."

"And this ass of a doctor made you believe those were symptoms of appendic'tis?"

"I knew they were before he confirmed me. I have been saved by just one week."

"How?"

"I am going to follow the directions given me by the doctor."

"Did he tell you to sleep with your feet out of bed and breakfast, dine and sup on catnip?"

"No, ma'am, he didn't. He told me to live on milk and water for the next four days. That boiled dinner smells to heaven, but I can't touch a mouthful of it. It's either milk and water or death for me."

"Look here, now," she said, determined on one last argument, "I have known of as many as five cases of appendicitis right around here, and not one of them had the symptoms you mention. All that ails you is a little biliousness or rheumatism."

"I have got my warning, my dear."

"But you haven't got it from our own doctor."

"One doctor is the same as another when it's a case as serious as this. I'm as hungry as a wolf, but don't tempt me. One full meal would mean the ambulance and the hospital. I might possibly come out alive, but the chances are only one in a hundred. I seem to be fat and solid, Mrs. Bowser, but as a matter of fact I am too spirituelle to stand much pain."

Mrs. Bowser had to laugh. She would have had to had he been standing over her with an ax. She led the way upstairs and was for dropping the subject, but Mr. Bowser wouldn't find his say yet.

"In case this milk and water diet doesn't stave off appendicitis and the results are fatal you will find all my business papers in the safe," he observed as he walked up and down.

"Very well."

May Marry if She Wishes.

"You will not be forced to marry to keep a roof over your head."

"No."

"Naturally I would rather you would not marry at all, but I am not going to exact any promise. I do wish, however, that you would visit my grave once in awhile. I shan't know it, of course, but it will help you not to forget me."

"I shall visit it once in two weeks during good weather," she replied as she saw his lip trembling.

"That is all I ask. The doctor assured me that milk and water would stave off the impending danger, but I have a presentiment, Mrs. Bowser—a presentiment that appendicitis will come and terminate fatally."

"And I have a presentiment that I shall some day meet that fool of a doctor and tell him what I think of him. It's just biliousness that ails you, and a dose or two of calomel would set you to singing. There are yellow streaks under your eyes, and those mean biliousness and nothing else."

Mr. Bowser shook his head and heaved a sigh that finally terminated in a groan and brought the cat out from under the piano. Then he started down the hall and put on his hat.

"Are you going out?" was asked.

"I'm going after a quart of milk. I may wake up in the night and want a drink. I may also talk with the druggist if he isn't busy. I am sure he would help you about the funeral arrangements."

Druggist Diagnoses Case.

Mrs. Bowser was glad to have him go. She knew the druggist was a blunt spoken man and would diagnose the case pretty speedily. She therefore ran into a neighbor's for an hour. Mr. Bowser made his way to the druggist's, and, not finding him rushed, he began:

"Doc, take a careful look at my face, will you?"

"Cert. Thinking of trading it off for a new one?"

"Does my phiz tell you anything?"

"Not much. It never did. The yellow streaks under your eyes show that you are bilious."

"What do pains in the back signify?"

"Rheumatism, generally."

"And roaring in the head?"

"A cold."

"And when your teeth seem too long?"

"A little neuralgia in the jaws. Why, what do you think ails you?"

"I was told by a doctor this morning that those symptoms heralded an attack of appendicitis."

"Herald your grandmother! Somebody has been making a fool of you again. You may have appendicitis some day, but it won't come on that way. What did the so called doctor tell you to do?"

"Drink milk and water," sighed Mr. Bowser.

"You ought to be kept on that diet for the rest of your natural life. Didn't Mrs. Bowser say the fellow was a humbug?"

"Well—er—you know"—

Tells Him to Go Eat.

"Of course she did, and of course he is. Go home and eat a hearty dinner. Eat as much as you want tomorrow and then take some calomel. Say, man, if you hadn't the wife you have somebody would get the socks off your feet."

Mr. Bowser didn't jaw back. He was too elated. Ten minutes later the cook was heaping the remains of that boiled dinner on the table, and he was eating like a Michigan lumberman. Mrs. Bowser came home and surprised him at it. "Well, you saw the druggist?" she queried as he refilled his plate.

"The druggist? What about?"

"About your threatened appendicitis."

"I hadn't heard anything about being threatened."

"But you gave up $5 to a fool of a doctor this morning to tell you to live on a milk and water diet for the next four days."

"My dear woman," said Mr. Bowser between huge bites, "please go away. You are laboring under a hallucination. You have somehow got me mixed up with your Uncle Joe or your brother Sam. Go away while I get a few mouthfuls to eat!" M. QUAD.

Never Could Catch One.

"Yes," said Miss Passay; "I discovered a burglar in our parlor last evening."

Announcing an Engagement

By BEATRICE STURGES

Copyright, 1906, by Beatrice Sturges

Daisy Leonard and Jack Rawlinson had been engaged for two years and nobody knew it. It was Daisy's own idea to keep the affair a secret. There seemed to her a deep romance in having what the novels termed a "hidden love," and besides a girl could have so much more fun when she was not ticketed as belonging to some one particular man, and so checked off the list of possible girls to be invited to picnics and escorted to dances by all the other nice young men.

She was sure of Jack, who adored her, and way down beneath the frivolous surface of her heart she loved him very much, but at the same time a girl who has always had her own way and been the center of a crowd of admirers does not want to give it all up.

At least Daisy didn't. She was a spoiled child and was quite accustomed to having her own way. All her life she had done what she wished rather than what her mother had told her. Finally Mrs. Leonard wearied of struggling along without a husband and with a headstrong daughter for so many years. In June she had married again and gone abroad for the summer, and Daisy had been sent to the mountains with her aunt and a family of cousins.

Jack, who worked in the city, came up now and then for a day or two, when Daisy treated him just about as she did some half dozen young men who were all her devoted admirers.

One day she and Jack had strolled off to a big rock which overhung the lake and was well surrounded with trees, and here Jack had protested.

"I say, Daisy, you ought to give me a show."

"Goodness, Jack, how unreasonable you are! Didn't I give you a trip to the glen this afternoon on purpose to stay with you? They didn't like it a bit, either."

THE LAUNCH MEANTIME WAS SPEEDING IN THEIR DIRECTION.

"They? What are they to you and me, Daisy? Aren't we everything to each other? I'm sure you're the whole world to me, sweetheart," he added, taking her hand.

She let him hold it while she pulled idly with the other at a fern growing out of a cleft in the rock. It was very nice to have such a splendid big fellow as Jack so devoted to you and all your own, but it was fascinating to go rowing one day with Tom, and riding next day with Jim, golfing with Will and playing tennis with Dick. It made life exciting, and she intimated as much to Jack.

"These fellows here are too fresh, anyway, and I don't like the way you go around with so many of them," he objected.

"Would you rather have me go with one all the time?" asked Daisy, mischievously tickling his cheek with a piece of feathery grass.

"Yes, and I should be the one. Dear, it's time we settled this thing—either you are engaged to me or you are not. If you are, then matters are going to change, and I intend to look out for you and to have it understood by your aunt and everybody at this place. If not"—

He broke off and sat looking across the lake with a firm line around his lips that the girl had never seen before.

She drew her hand away. Indeed, he had dropped it when he had first begun to speak. She stiffened, although her lips trembled, and if he had looked at her probably everything would have been different, but he sat and gazed moodily at a white sail across the blue lake.

"If the engagement is irksome to you," she began stiffly—

He turned to her now impatiently. "For heaven's sake, Daisy, don't talk nonsense. I want what is due me, that's all. I came up this time chiefly to tell you that I have been transferred to the western branch of our business and have to be there in six weeks. Will you come with me, sweetheart? You know how I love you, and I want you now for my very own. You will, won't you?"

She might have said yes, but as luck would have it voices and steps broke on the stillness of the wood, and in an instant two girls and two young men were climbing on to the rock beside them. After a few moments of the usual nonsense Jack rose.

"Will you come?" he asked, showing too plainly that he was bored.

"Not just yet," she answered. She could not bear to have the others see Jack "order her around," and, besides, she observed a launch approaching, and she knew that in it was Dick Carter looking for her, and she wanted the pleasant ride home.

So Jack went alone in anything but a cheerful frame of mind.

That night at the hotel hop it seemed to Jack that she was unusually gay. He danced with several other girls before going to her, and then she stood with the young launch owner just as the fifth waltz was about to start. He put out his hand with a commanding gesture.

"Will you give this to me, Daisy?" he asked.

The other man looked rather ruffled and then said jestingly: "Too late. Miss Leonard belongs to me"—

Jack broke in: "I beg your pardon. Miss Leonard is my"—

But before he could say it Daisy put her hand on the other's shoulder. "Mr. Rawlinson is mistaken. I have promised this to Mr. Carter."

She danced late that night, but saw no more of Jack. He spent two hours in the bowling alley and then took the two mile walk around Star lake. The next morning he paid his bill and arranged to leave on the 3 o'clock train. To fill in the time he took a canoe and was soon pulling out by himself toward the center of the lake. It was a day of brilliant sunshine and crisp breezes. It seemed strange that one could be unhappy with so much beauty in the world.

Presently across the water he saw Dick Carter's launch with Daisy and several others aboard, and his wrath burned anew. They were coming in his direction, and he slowly rowed off toward the camp, which was opposite the hotel. A young boy was out in a frail canoe, and Jack wondered if he was able to manage it in the stiff wind that swept around the point. The next minute the little boat spun round, turned over and the boy went down.

Jack pulled several long hard strokes before he reached the spot and jumped in after the little fellow, who had gone down twice. He managed to grab him the next time, however, but meantime the canoes had both drifted away, and the only thing to do was to swim with the boy to the camp. It was a fair distance, and the water was almost icy cold, after the manner of mountain lakes.

The launch meantime was speeding in their direction, and Jack knew that he could hold the boy up until they came, but he was beginning to feel numb himself. His breath came with labored gasps and he was whispering to the boy to float when he saw that six more strokes would get them to shallow water where the nurses' camp had a dock. He took five and then lost consciousness.

It was fully ten minutes before he came to himself again. He was inside a log house, rolled in blankets, and a white capped woman was holding some brandy to his lips.

"Is the boy all right?" he whispered.

She nodded. Then there was a noise on the dock and presently on the steps of the little house. The nurse went out. There was a sound of men's voices and also of women's, but Jack heard just one rising above all the rest in excited tones.

"But I'm different," she said, "and I must see him. I—I'm engaged to be married to him." It was the sweetest thing he had ever heard.

In a moment she was bending over him.

"Sweetheart," she murmured.

He tried to speak.

"Hush, you mustn't say a word. Wait till you're rested," she cautioned. Then with true feminine inconsistency she bent over and asked him a question.

For answer he threw his arms around her neck and kissed her.

Agricultural Politics.

A young farmer who had been elected to a state legislature and instructed to follow the lead of the state central committee of his party was taken to task by some of his constituents for voting against a party measure.

"My friends," he replied, "when I was a boy one of our neighbors got a new hired man—a chap from the city. One day he took him out to a pasture lot and set him to turning the sod under.

"'You start in here,' he said, 'and plow right to that old red cow.'

"Then he went off about his work. Toward noon he came back to see how the fellow was getting along and found he had plowed a rambling furrow all over the field and was still at it.

"'Here!' he shouted. 'What do you mean by that sort of work?'

"'Why,' said the man, 'you told me to plow to the red cow, and I've been plowing toward her all morning, but she keeps walking all over the field.'

"Now, I'll admit, gentlemen, that you told me to plow to a red cow, but I should like to have you as farmers compare my furrows with that cow's trail."

A Foolometer.

Some visitors who were being shown over a paupor lunatic asylum inquired of their guide what method was employed to discover when the inmates were sufficiently recovered to leave.

"Well," replied he, "you see, it's this way. We have a big trough of water and we turn on the tap. We leave it running and tell 'em to bail out the water with pails until they've emptied the trough."

"How does that prove it?" asked one of the visitors.

"Well," said the guide, "them as ain't idiots turns off the tap."—Boston Transcript.

IF congressmen were paid in proportion to the labor they perform and the service they render, there would be a wide variation in salaries.

A semicolon placed in a law kept Boston from drinking after 11 o'clock at night. This is the first time that a semicolon was a full stop.

AN Ohio man married six sisters consecutively, by which he reduced the mother-in-law peril to a minimum. All problems will be solved some day or reduced to a safe minimum.

CONDITIONS in New York are indeed complex. When a millionaire is threatened, he notifies the police to watch suspects, and then employs a detective from another town to watch the police.

THE Indiana man who gave $100,000 to foreign missions and went to live in the almshouse has treasures laid up in heaven, which is more than can be said of some of our trust magnates who keep every cent they ever get.

"NO COMPLICATED law, nor scientific engineer, nor extravagant expeditures are necessary to accomplish great improvements in existing road conditions. The chief engineer of the Highway Bureau of Maryland has recently stated that 28 8-10 miles of model road has been completed in the last year at a cost of over $150,000. This means, therefore, that each mile has cost about $6,500. Under a local, self-government plan of building roads equally as durable and as good can be constructed at half that cost. Indeed, excellent roads have been built in the past few years in Washington county for about $1,000 a mile."

Such is the expression of President Armstrong of Hagerstown, who presided at a recent meeting of the Maryland Turnpike Association. In his address Mr. Armstrong said the most important economic question confronting the State of Maryland today is how to secure an improved public road system at an outlay commensurate with the means of the taxpayers. Mr. Armstrong seemingly views an important question from a standpoint worthy of consideration.

AGAINST BLENDED WHISKEY.

Secretary Wilson said Saturday that his visit to some of the Baltimore distilleries Friday had been productive of good results. The Secretary was accompanied by Dr. H. W. Wiley. They examined the operations of two distilleries, one blending establishment, and a gin still, with a view to ascertaining how the liquors are made. They got information they had not been able to obtain by conferences with distillers.

At the gin still which they visited only six barrels of the liquor are manufactured each day. It is pronounced pure by Dr. Wiley, but not a gallon of it is sold in the market. It is sold exclusively to blenders, who mix the pure gin with neutral spirits and some flavoring material, and that product is put on the market as gin. As another result of their investigation, it was discovered that three-fourths of the straight whiskey made in this country is sold to blenders, who use it in connection with spirits and flavoring and coloring matter to make their products.

As a result of the investigation it is probable Secretary Wilson will not recede from his decision, based on the pure food and drug acts, in which he held that the so-called "blended whiskies," artificially colored and flavored, were "spurious imitations" of whiskey and that "the mixture of such an imitation with a genuine article cannot be regarded as a mixture of like substances within the letter and intent of the law."

The blenders object to this decision, and have tried to induce Secretary Wilson to recede from it or, at least, to modify it, but the indications are that he will stand by it squarely.

PIN-PRICKS.

If the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune" always came in the form of defeats and calamities of heroic proportions and appreciable importance, perhaps the average man or the average woman would bear them with fortitude if not with good humor. But the aggravating pin-pricks of the every-day environment of the average man and the average woman are the pestiferous experiences that wear out tempers and becloud sunshiny dispositions and imperil the most important relations and interests of our humanity.

There is something particularly annoying in the experience of having one's plans upset by any small physical or material failure or breakdown. If a newspaper plant is badly damaged by earthquake or fire, the whole force of the printery, from devil to editor, works with unwonted energy, exaltation and efficiency; but let the "folder" go into a fit of total depravity and refuse to work just at press time, with scant margin to make the mails, and there will be nothing exalted in the spiritual condition of that printing office for the time being, from turret to foundation stone.

In the cultivation of character as in the conduct of a business there must be a careful attention to details to insure success. Don't neglect to note the effect that the every-day pin-pricks are having upon your disposition. They may if neglected produce a kind of spiritual eczema, an abnormal sensitiveness and chronic irritability, which is one of the most unlovely developments of which human character is capable.

As in the case of most chronic disorders, physical as well as spiritual, prophylactic precautions are easier and more effective than curative treatment, and the best protection against the bad effects of the inevitable pin-pricks is the cultivation of a sense of humor and a sense of proportion. If you never take a pin-prick for more than the insignificant and inconsequential thing it really is there can be no serious result from it. If the multitude of them never goad you beyond the point of a good-natured humorous kick the pesky things can never do any real damage to your disposition.

AND now comes the Richmond Times-Dispatch, a usually peaceful and law-abiding contemporary, and raises the question whether phonetics is or are. Surely the dead might be allowed to rest in peace.

THE VALUE OF WOODLANDS.

Occupying as it does, the rocky, sterile soil, or the equally untillable swampy lands, the woodlot is the most neglected part of the farm. Were it not for the excellent natural conditions favoring forest growth in Maryland, our woodlands would long ago have refused to yield their valuable products in retaliation for our neglect and wanton waste of their resources. But a new order of things is coming into being. The farmer is awakening to the fact that wood is just as much a crop as hay or corn, that intelligent care will bring a better yield and will increase the value of the property. A good woodlot is like good buildings, good fences—an improvement with a market value when it becomes desirable to sell.

The most important function of the woodlot is to supply the farmer with the required fuel and construction material needed on the farm. There is a constant demand for fence posts, rails, stakes, and poles as well as an occasional need of saw logs for making the necessary framing material and boards for farm buildings. In addition to this the farmer often finds that he can sell timber for cross-ties, poles, piling, etc., at a good price.

The single item of fire wood is an important one to the farmer. In one of the counties of the State where the average rural conditions exist it was found, by careful estimate, that the average annual consumption of fire wood per family was about 14 cords. If the farmer had to buy this, or haul coal from a distant railroad station, it would be quite a tax. He can cut his wood at most convenient times when other farm work is not pressing so that the fuel he uses is practically that much gained. The firewood taken from the woods, if it is the dead material as is generally the case, is really an improvement to the woodlot and cannot be considered as reducing the growing stock.

The woodlot serves other purposes which, though not so apparent as those that have been given, are none the less of importance. These are in the nature of protection. A woodlot surrounding the home and farm buildings, or located on the windward side of them, affords protection to both man and beast. This means not only added comfort, but a saving of food and fuel.

Woodlands at the source of streams or near springs tend to preserve in them an even flow throughout the year. It is a well known fact that woodland springs live through periods of drought when those not protected by trees dry up.

Windbreaks of trees also have a very beneficial influence in checking evaporation of moisture over adjacent cultivated fields during windy, dry weather.

The woodlot is just as essential to a well ordered farm as buildings or anything else that contributes to the comfort, convenience, and beauty of the surroundings.

IMMIGRATION TO MARYLAND.

The success of the South Carolina Bureau of Immigration in bringing into that State needed labor for farm and factory has stimulated other States to take similar action. Marked impetus has been given to the movement by the decision of Mr. Straus, Secretary of Commerce and Labor, that the assistance extended to immigrants by the State of South Carolina through its Commissioner is not contrary to the contract-labor law. The movement has now reached Maryland. The farmers' clubs of Montgomery county have led off by an appeal to Governor Warfield, asking that the Maryland Bureau of Immigration be directed to proceed in the manner followed by South Carolina.

It is to be noted that the South Carolina Bureau has special authority of law for its action and is supplied with the necessary funds. The law of that State puts the business in the hands of a Commissioner, and provides that he may make arrangements with steamship companies and immigration agencies in this country and abroad, and that the necessary expenditures may be made out of the annual appropriation for the department, although the Commissioner is not forbidden to act without fee as the agent of citizens of the State, who wish to meet the expense of bringing desirable immigrants to their lands or property. This covers the case in which the Commissioner brought over operatives for the cotton mills, and permitted the Department of Commerce and Labor to render the decision declaring that he had acted within the law.

The practical success of the South Carolina law is due to the fact that instead of merely inviting immigration the State goes after it. Commissioner Watson went abroad and made personal arrangements to get the kind of immigrants desired, and to see that they got direct transportation. Now that the movement has started, the first batch of immigrants are themselves sending back money to help others to come. One of those immigrants arranged with the Commissioner to bring ten members of his family. The next steamship load of immigrants direct for South Carolina leaves Europe on January 16. If the immigrants continue to find conditions of employment in South Carolina satisfactory, the flow of labor will continue through natural influences. The success of South Carolina shows what may be done by taking hold in the right way. To get similars results, Maryland will have to employ similar means.

Died.

LEE—At the home of his mother, Mrs. Mary Lee, near Sunnyside, Monday morning, after a brief illness of diphtheria, Yantz Lee, aged 29 years. The deceased was taken ill during holiday week but notwithstanding the efforts of his physician to stay the disease it made such inroads into his system that death resulted within a short time. The funeral took place Tuesday morning at 11 o'clock, the interment being made at the Red House cemetery. The deceased was a brother of ex-Sheriff W. P. Lee and was unmarried, residing on the farm with his mother and a younger sister.

FOGLEPOLE—At his home three miles south of Mountain Lake Park yesterday morning, of extreme old age, John Foglepole, aged 88 years. The deceased was a resident of this county almost his entire lifetime and was highly respected.

Very muddy roads are the result of the heavy rains of last week; very mild weather for January.

Merchant J. J. Bender has just unloaded a car load of feed and expects several others in the near future.

The sale of Mr. Peter Royer, of Keyser, was attended by people of this vicinity. Everything is reported to have brougut a fair price.

Mr. J. L. Augustine, of Addison, Pa., bought a fine property of C. A. Bender one day last week. We certainly welcome Mr. A. to our town.

Messrs. G. J. Gnagy and C. J. Otto are at Friendsville attending a stockholders meeting of the Garrett County Telephone Co.

H. H. Baker and wife attended church at Maple Grove Sunday.

Among the folks of this place and vicinity attending college at different places, and spending the holiday vacation at home, have returned to their schools are C. E. Stanton, T. Ray Stanton, College Park, Md.; Melvin Broadwater, St. John's, Annapolis; Bayard T. Kelley, V. L. Blocher, N. Irving Broadwater, Maryland University, Baltimore; John D. Miller, Daleville, Va.; Alvin J. Miller, Union Bridge, Md. On accouut of Mrs. J. S. Broadwater's ill health, Miss Ethel was unable to return to Woman's College, Frederick, Md.

Our schools here have opened again with a large enrollment, which speaks well for the teachers, Prof. Earl King and Miss Rose Callaghan.

Wreck on the Grade.

Last Saturday afternoon a freight wreck occurred at Empire, a mile west of Bloomington on the seventeen mile grade, which destroyed several freight cars and their contents and delayed traffic four hours or more. No one was injured in the smash-up.

WOULD TOMAHAWK GOV. WARFIELD

State Senator Gorman on the Warpath After Maryland's Chief Execution.

State Senator Arthur P. Gorman made an address before the Concord Club of Baltimore on Tuesday, in which he attacked Gov. Warfield by inference, and practically called him a traitor to his party. The club is one of the leading organizations of Baltimore, and annually celebrates Jackson day. On this occasion Senator Gorman was requested to be the orator of the evening. Some reference to the governor was expected, and the hall was crowded with representatives, Democrats. Mr. Gorman, it is understood, will lead the fight against Warfield in Howard County, in which both reside, and the attack of Tuesday night was the first gun of his campaign. Judging from the line of argument, Mr. Gorman will make the disfranchisement amendment which the governor opposed the basis of his attack. He said in part:

"In this State of ours we have not always followed the sound and sane policies which guided Andrew Jackson. We have not always found Democrats true who should have been true to the party which elected them and to its principles. In recent years we have witnessed the sad spectacle of a man elected as a Democrat who failed to do what he was elected to do.

"The people in their might decided this should be a white man's State. We won a grand victory, but, alas, the man who was instructed by the people to represent their will was wanton. He forsook the cause of the people. He threw obstacles in the way of an expression of the people. Some mysterious influence seemed to be at work to divert him from the cause of the people.

"But, my friends, this is only a temporary defeat. The white man of Maryland is aroused. No man or set of men can defeat the great principles of Jackson."

Mr. Gorman then paid his respects to the independent Democrats, who, he said, could not be classed as Democrats. He also criticised the Democratic newspaper in Baltimore, which, he declared, were unfair to the party.

First Newspaper in Preston.

The first newspaper ever printed in Preston county, W. Va., was issued from the old log house still standing on the farm owned by M. F. Chorpenning about one and one half miles south of Brandonville on the Terra Alta pike. This house was built in the year 1794 and is still standing and in fair condition although 112 years old. The exact date of the first issue of this paper called the Mt. Pleasant Printing Press is not given but it was some time during the year 1850. The farm on which the old house is located was purchased by Jonathan Chorpenning, father of the present owner of the place, contains 170 acres with about 100 acres in a good state of cultivation and 60 acres of white oak timber. The farm was taken up and patented by Isaac and Samuel Forman, who were Quakers, in the year 1794, and the house and barn built the same year. The shingles on the barn were placed there 70 years ago.

Impoverished Soil

Impoverished soil, like impoverished blood, needs a proper fertilizer. A chemist by analyzing the soil can tell you what fertilizer to use for different products.

If your blood is impoverished your doctor will tell you what you need to fertilize it and give it the rich, red corpuscles that are lacking in it. It may be you need a tonic, but more likely you need a concentrated fat food, and fat is the element lacking in your system.

There is no fat food that is so easily digested and assimilated as

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

Mr. Edward J. Frantz and daughter Mrs. John J. Sweeney, have returned from their visit to Selbysport relatives and friends.

The Bloomington correspondent of a Piedmont paper said last week: "Eight inches of snow in Oakland and eighteen inches of mud in Bloomington. Let's go to Oakland."

Mr. J. Wilson Humbird, who has been suffering from an attack of grip, which has confined him to his home, is convalescing, and expects to leave on a trip to California, the early part of next week. He will be accompanied by his son, Mr. Elder Humbird.—Cumberland News.

Every school boy knows that a kite would not fly unless it had a string tying it down. It is just so in life. The man who is tied down by a half a dozen bloomiug responsibilities and their mother, will make a higher and stronger flight than the bachelor, who having nothing to keep him steady is always floundering in the mud. If you want to ascend in the world, tie yourself to somebody.

A. C. Whetsell has ordered quite a number of pairs of roller skates and will open a skating rink in Oakland upon their arrival from the factory. A number of years ago roller skating was in vogue but like everything else it had its day. Now it promises to be a fad again.

There must be some life in the boy, or he will not rise under any circumstances until the day appointed for the resurrection of the dead. If he starts out in life as a failure he will end as one unless he gets thoroughly wakened up in some way. Give every boy and girl a fair chance and reasonable encouragement, and do not condemn them even because of a large degree of downstupidity; for many so called good-for-nothing boys, blockheads, numskulls, dullards or dunces were only boys out of their places, round boys forced into square holes.

Mr. P. T. Garthright, the Mountain Lake Park merchant, by advertisement printed in the columns of this paper today offers some exceptional bargains in dry goods, shoes, clothing, and other lines ofmerchandisé. He also offers at great bargains a number of pieces of improved real estate and several acres of unimproved ground lying within the confines of the Park. Persons with money to invest may safely do so in the properties offered by Mr. Garthright.

In no activity has there been more progress during the last twenty years than that of the country newspaper. There are now hundreds of country papers which in editorial ability, mechanical appearance, and all that contributes to inspire respect and command attention are fully abreast of their metropolitan contemporaries, in moral tone, and often in editorials they surpass most of the great dailies. In times past the country editor was quite generally regarded with a half pitying contempt as a good-natured but chicken-hearted chronicler of inconsequential locals. All of this has changed. Country newspapers, as a class, wield the mightiest influence in the nation. The editors are men of character and enterprise, doing more for the community for less money than any other body of workers.

APPOINTED POSTMASTER.

Mr. James C. Peddicord Will Succeed Capt. J. M. Jarboe In Oakland.

Mr. James C. Peddicord, son of Mr. Thomas J. Peddicord, of Oakland, was on Monday appointed postmaster at Oakland by the President, when he sent Mr. Peddicord's nomination to the Senate for confirmation.

Capt. Jarboe's term of office expired on December 20th last. Mr. Peddicord will take charge of the office as soon as the preliminaries, such as executing his bond, etc., are arranged.

THE REPUBLICAN feels that the appointment of Mr. Peddicord will be eminently satisfactory to the patrons of the office and extends its congratulations.

Mr. Julius Scherr, of Eglon, was in Oakland last Saturday on his way to Charleston, West Va., to be present on Wednesday of this week at the convening of the State Legislature in that city. Mr. Scherr is an ex-member of the Legislature, a strong supporter of Governor Dawson and the new tax laws of his native state. His efforts at Charleston will be directed against the opponents of the Governor and for the correction of minor defects in the existing laws of the Commonwealth.

Some of our farmers wonder why their sons have a desire to quit the farm, preferring town or city life. The cause is with the farmer himself. With the boy on the farm it is perpetual toil in good weather, all through the busy season, and perpetual loneliness in bad weather and most of the winter season. The time when the farmer has leisure is at the very time when they cannot get away from home on account of their isolation and bad roads. The boy's heart revolts against this unendurable loneliness and to free himself from it, walks miles through the mud to spend an hour at the country store. We are glad to note that in some sections of our country the young people of both sexes, have broken through these barriers, and established farmers' clubs and little societies of one sort or another. This should be encouraged and will prove a great tonic to keep young people on the farm and make life to them worth living.

From the Pacific Coast.

A letter from Mrs. Eliza Gnagey, of Pasadena, Cal., mother of Mr. John E. Gnagey, recently of Accident, this county, was received by the editor on Tuesday morning in which Mrs. Gnagey enclosed a number of rose buds which retained their sweet fragrance upon their arrival here. Mrs. Gnagey said in her letter: "This being the last day of the old year I will try and start in the new year with this debt off my mind, so enclose money to pay what is due you on subscription and to renew the same. I greatly enjoy the weekly visits of the dear old home paper. Our country has been most prosperous the past year and we have been blest with generous rains making the valleys, hills and mountains appear most refreshing and beautiful with their verdure of green, but with plenty of snow in sight up on the mountains. Trusting that you may continue to prosper and enjoy a happy 1907, I am, very truly, Mrs. Eliza Gnagey."

MR. M. J. MILLER INJURED.

Fell In His Barn Last Wednesday and Broke Ribs.

Mr. Melchoir J. Miller, of Accident, is in a serious condition as the result of a fall which he sustained on Wednesday of last week while feeding stock in his barn, when he fell against the manger of one of the stalls and broke a number of ribs, two of them penetrating his right lung. The fall rendered Mr. Miller unconscious and he remained lying in the barn for some time before he was found by others members of the family, when he was taken to his dwelling.

For several days after the accident it was thought that Mr. Miller had been paralyzed, he being unable to move a portion of his body. On Saturday his condition became alarming and Dr. McComas was summoned to his bedside, who upon examining the injured man discovered his true state and reset the broken ribs.

COMMANDER R. M. G. BROWN REMEMBERED

In Resolutions Passed By Hoffman Post, G. A. R.—Pay High Tribute.

At a meeting of the Hoffman Post, G. A. R., Morgantown, held Saturday, January 5th, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, It has pleased Almighty God, the Grand Commander of the Universe, to summon our beloved comrade, Commander Robert M. G. Brown, from the field of action on this earth to broader fields in the Great Beyond, to undertake higher, greater and nobler duties there, yet our hearts are sore at the loss of our brother and comrade, and the place left vacant in our hearts can not be filled. Therefore be it

Resolved, That in the death of Commander Robert M. G. Brown, United States navy, Hoffman Post Number 62, Grand Army of the Republic, has lost one of its best, truest and most loyal members, and the State a most distinguished citizen, one who was ever faithful to his comrades, his country and his nation.

That he was a true patriot who, in his country's hour of need, gave himself willingly and gladly to her service, never shrinking, never faltering, never hesitating in the performance of any task, however hard or toilsome, imposed upon him by God or native land.

That the same unflinching courage which characterized him in the face of danger when in action, endured through the years that followed the injuries received in his country's service; no word of complaint ever fell from his lips, no disposition save a cheerful one was ever shown in the long hours of pain. In the patient, cheerful endurance of daily vexation, weariness and weakness he showed as high a degree of heroism, as when faced by sudden danger or emergency.

That his patriotic unselfishness, fidelity to duty and courageous endurance of pain are an example to the youth of our land, teaching them that no higher duty exists on earth than willing, uncomplaining service to our country and her flag.

That our deepest sympathy is extended to his daughter. May God mercifully bless and enmfort her, as well as all other friends and relatives of our comrade.

That copies of these resolutions be enrolled upon our records, sent to his daughter and published in our papers.

J. M. SHAW,
Acting Adjutant.

J. M. BURNS,
Commander.

Robert Matthew Gay Brown was born in Kingwood, W. Va., December 8, 1845, and was appointed a midshipman in the navy July 22, 1864. Four years later he was promoted to ensign and in one year more advanced to the grade of master, December 13, 1872, he was commissioned as lieutenant, and he was attached to the United States steamship Trenton as lieutenant on the occasion of the hurricane at Samoa in 1889. Lieutenant Brown rendered gallant service on that occasion, but in so doing he suffered severely from exposure and rheumatism developed. He was ill of this malady during much of the remainder of his life. Lieutenant Brown was promoted to lieutenant commander from April 27, 1893, and was transferred to the retired list December 5, 1904. During the Spanish-Americau war he served at the navy yard, Norfolk, Va., from April 28, 1898, to October 11, of the same years. He was commissioned a commander on tho retired list of the navy from March 20, 1902,

About 20 years ago Lieutenant Brown married Katherine, daughter of ex-Senator Henry G. Davis, of West Virginia, and one daughter, Katherine, survives the couple. Mrs. Brown died three years ago.

Pension Secured.

Mr. Christian Lichty, of Grantsville, this county, who served in a Pennsylvania regiment during the Civil war, has been granted an increase of pension up to $12 per month. Mr. Jacob Brown, of Cumberland, was his attorney.

Notice to Stockholders.

The Farmers' Union Association and FireInsurance Company of Garrettcounty will hold its annual meeting at Accident on Saturday, December 29th, 1906, at 1 o'clock p. m.

W. M. FRAZEE, Secretary.

TO BE TRIED AGAIN

J. M. Hauger Alleged Counterfeiter, Will Be Tried at Parkersburg.

On last Thursday United States Marshal Barrett, of Parkersburg, was in Oakland, where he summoned as witnesses to appear at Parkersburg on Friday of this week, Messrs. John W. Davis and G. A. Fraley, in the case of the Government against John M. Hauger, of Corinth, West Va., who was once tried for counterfeiting when the jury failed to arrive at a verdict. The case was then set for re-trial at Parkersburg.

Hauger is now out on $5,000 for his appearance at Parkersburg. His accomplice was George Minear, whose full confession won for him a long term in the West Virginia penitentiary, where he is now serving time. The Federal authorities are of the opinion that they can secure a conviction, from the fact that recently they secured the moulds for making silver coins which are alleged to have been the property of Hauger.

Justice For The Railroads

By J. J. HILL, President Great Northern System

TODAY the entire country is suffering from want of transportation facilities to move its business without unreasonable delay. The prevailing idea with the public is that the railways are short of cars, while the fact is that THE SHORTAGE IS IN TRACKS AND TERMINALS to provide a greater opportunity for the movement of the cars.

More cars? Yes, we need more cars, but we need also cars of greater capacity, heavier trains and MORE MILES OF RAILROAD to haul them over. In ten years the railroads of the country expanded 20 per cent for the handling of a business that increased 110 PER CENT. Suppose you are able in the near future to increase that expansion 50 per cent? That will still leave 40 per cent a year of the business WITHOUT ANY FACILITIES for taking care of it.

It is estimated that from 115,000 to 120,000 miles of track must be built AT ONCE to take care of this immense business. But to build that amount will cost as much as the civil war cost at least. It will cost from $4,000,000,000 to $5,000,000,000. A thousand million dollars a year for five years will scarcely suffice. Why, there is not money enough or rails enough IN ALL THE WORLD to do this thing.

And if the rails were piled up ready for the undertaking, and if the money were in bank today, it would be impossible to GET THE LABOR with which to do it.

LABOR IN THE MINES, IN THE FOREST, IN THE QUARRY, IS BEHIND A STONE WALL WHICH IT CANNOT SCALE.

There is no question since the civil war of half the consequence of this one. Why, you can't go out and contract with any railroad in this country to move 500 cars of freight from St. Paul to New York in thirty days. And the railroad could not deliver it if it should contract to do it.

There is not money enough available to bring relief to this situation UNDER THE CONDITIONS EXISTING. Are men going to invest their money in railroads as long as railroads are considered OUTLAWS? The fact is the railroad has not been getting justice in this country. Why, in the recent campaign we beheld the spectacle of two great political parties preaching the doctrine of the operation of the railroads by the government. The federal government is to run the main lines—they are the only ones that make any money nowadays—and the private investors can have the branch lines, THERE BEING NO PROFIT IN THEM. Is that the way to get men to put more money into the country's railroads? Is this the way to get more railroad mileage so that the country's freight can be moved?

It is time to CALL A HALT in this treatment of the railroads. Why, I challenge any one to point out a road that has not failed at some point in its career.

MOST OF THEM HAVE HAD THEIR CAPITAL WIPED OUT AND HAVE GONE INTO THE HANDS OF RECEIVERS. IT'S BEEN A FAD, AND A COSTLY FAD, TO BUILD RAILROADS.

American Dramatic Art Is In a Poor Way

By Dr. LUDWIG FULDA, Eminent German Dramatist and Poet

IN rich America the dramatic art is the POOREST of all the arts. Public bodies and private citizens vie with one another in patronizing and promoting the other arts, BUT THEY IGNORE THE THEATER. They think it is not good enough to deserve subsidies. The drama is on the very lowest rung of the ladder.

America has not yet bred a dramatist, and still her theaters produce almost entirely home plays—light burlesque and comedy, melodrama, spectacular pieces in which revolvers play the chief part. Problem plays are tabooed. There is too much of the PRUDE in American playgoers to permit this.

Now and again one hears Shakespeare, NEVER SYSTEMATICALLY, and of the best of what Europe produces Americans know next to nothing. Managers go on playing the same piece night after night as long as it fills their coffers. This is love of art! IT STIFLES ART.

Then the star system! In the playbill the name of the piece is printed small; that of the STAR is in flaming letters. It is only the star the American theater goers wish to see.

Nowhere in the world have I seen such beautiful actresses. Nowhere have I seen such ARTLESS DRAMATIC STAGING and such an artless public.

The men who write for the American stage are to be envied. They need not bother about dramatic technique. IT WOULD BE LOST ON THEIR PATRONS. Their dramatis personae can come and go how and when they like. Motive is not necessary.

IN THE LAND OF WONDERFUL MECHANICAL INVENTIONS THE STAGE MACHINERY IS THE MOST PRIMITIVE; EVEN THE MOST ORDINARY APPARATUS IS MISSING.

The Trusts Are Like Pigs

By CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Secretary of the Navy

OUR big, strong, greedy and overprosperous trusts are LIKE PIGS. They crowd their smaller and weaker fellows from the feeding trough, so that these don't get their FAIR SHARE of our national prosperity.

THE PROBLEM IS HOW TO SO FENCE OFF THE GREAT BEASTS AS TO GIVE THE LITTLE ONES A SHOW.

Remember, we don't complain of the former because they are themselves big and fat, BUT BECAUSE THE OTHERS ARE SMALL AND THIN. The fatter the big pigs become the better for their owner and the more money the trusts make, and it is better for the American people, provided in the one case that all the little pigs GET FAT, TOO, or, at all events, as fat as these can, and in the other that all dealers outside of the trusts have a FAIR FIELD and the trusts have no favor.

The Adventure of Mrs. Niggsworth

HEARING a noise in the lower hall, Mrs. Niggsworth got out of bed, grasped a pillow and rushed toward the stairs.

"Ma, ma, don't!" cried little Rosie Niggsworth. "Please stay here with me."

"Be quiet, child," her mother replied, "an I stay where you are!"

With wonderful nimbleness the lady went down the stairs and at the bottom leaped upon a man who was crouching behind the newel post as if to escape her notice. There was no light save for a small streak that came from an electric lamp on the corner and found its way through a chink in the window shade.

"Oh, you will, will you?" the lady cried fairly leaping upon the intruder and clapping her pillow over his head and face. "I'll teach you a lesson that I don't think you'll forget in a hurry!"

Then by a dexterous twist she succeeded in getting her fingers into his hair. With a quick jerk she swung his head against the sharp corner of the newel post before he could recover from the shock he had sustained when she had flung herself upon him and he collapsed, rolling over on the floor as if he had been felled with an ax.

At that moment little Rosie and the hired girl got downstairs and the lights were turned up.

"Merciful heaven!" cried Mrs. Niggsworth as she looked at the upturned face of the unconscious housebreaker. "I thought it was pa!"

After which she fainted, and before they could revive her the thief made his escape.—Chicago Record-Herald.

The Caddie's Reply.

Walter J. Travis, the golfer, set up his ball and then made half a dozen swishes at the short grass with the driver.

"I am not in good form," he said. "I am playing like a broker we had here last week.

"This broker played once around, making a dreadful exhibition of himself. Of this, though, he was not aware. He was doing pretty well for him.

"The man's caddie was an unusually quiet, stolid lad, a boy with a freckled face, quite devoid of expression.

"And since the caddie never once laughed or sneered at his bad play the broker took a fancy to him. And he said at the end of the round, in the hope of getting a compliment:

"'I have been traveling for the last six months. I am quite out of practice. This is why I am in such bad form today.'

"The caddie replied calmly:

"'Then ye've played before, have ye, sir?'"—Kansas City Independent.

All Looked Alike.

Uncle Eph had long boasted that he had never needed the services of a doctor, but now he was ill, and his neighbor felt that the time had come when a physician should be called.

"Come, now, Uncle Eph," said she, "we will call whoever you wish. You know there's a good allopath and a good homeopath, and there's a new doctor, an osteopath. Now, who'll you have?"

"Waal," drawled Uncle Eph, "I dunno ez it matters. They do say that all paths lead to the grave!"—Lippincott's Magazine.

Particular.

"Why do you bring a strainer with the glass of milk?"

"Some people are so particular about a few flies."—Fliegende Blatter.

No Needless Waste.

The goldfish in the little aquarium had thriven quite well until a few weeks after they had been intrusted to the care of the new maid, when they were found feebly floating almost on their backs.

"Harriet," called the anxious mistress, "have you given the fish any fresh water lately?"

"No, ma'am," answered Harriet, "they haven't drunk the water I gave them last month yet."—Woman's Home Companion.

Secure.

"Jawkins says that he never gets the worst of an argument."

"Certainly. Any one with no more sense than to argue with a boor like Jawkins isn't competent to put up a good argument."—Washington Star.

The Hornet.

"I love to sit," he softly said,
"On banks of velvet grass,
Where crystal streamlets ripple by,
Still singing as they pass.
I love to watch the velvet bee
Suck honey from the flower,
And purple harebells bud and blow
Within a woodland bower.

"I love to sit"— But here he rose
With more of speed than grace,
A look of great surprise and pain
Upon his startled face.
No more he seeks a sylvan seat
To gracefully adorn it,
Because on that occasion he
Sat down upon a hornet.

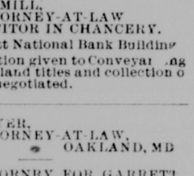
You Can Easily Operate This Typewriter Yourself.



your correspondent.
Dont write him anything by hand that takes him time to make out—that may leave him in doubt—that he can't easily read.
And don't fill out legal papers or card memos—or make out accounts of hotel menus in your own handwriting.
It looks bad, reflects on your standing, makes people think you can't afford a stenographer, and is sometimes ambiguous.
You can write out your letters—make out an abstract—fill in an insurance policy—enter your card memos—make out your accounts, or a hotel menu—or do any kind of writing you need, on any kind, size or thickness of paper, and space any way you want on

The Standard Visible Writer.

You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 50 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 81 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.

Sewing a French Hem

By Belle Manistee

Copyright, 1906, by P. C. Eastment

"This looks just as good as it sounded—Riverside farm," ruminated Cleo, as she sat by the open window of the big, airy bedroom she had rented for the summer.

"And Mrs. Lacey," she continued in her musing, "is the ideal farmer's wife. There is only one drawback—she referred constantly in our drive from the station to her handsome son. I hope he won't think it is in his line of duty to be attentive to his mother's summer boarder. One reason I came off up here was because I was so tired of attentions."

Her reverie was interrupted by a sound of voices from below.

"Now, Hugh," she heard Mrs. Lacey say pleadingly, "you really must overcome your dislike of girls and show this one some little attention."

"Oh, mother," was the remonstrative response, "if I had supposed that was to be on your programme I'd have opposed your summer boarder plan more strongly than I did."

"But we ought to do something to make her stay pleasant," persisted his mother.

"Fact is, mother, I'm a man's man and you know it. Girls don't like me. She'd have a better time if"—

"Now, Hugh, you've got your idea of girls from the giggling ones about here. This one is sensible and"—

"Oh, one of the mannish kind. I'd really prefer the silly type."

"Well, Hugh, just give her a row on the river this afternoon and I won't ask you to do anything else for her."

"All right," was the resigned reply "She'll probably insist on rowing. Maybe she'll refuse to go with me."

"I wonder if I should," smiled the girl at the window. "No. Just for revenge, I'll go."

When she came downstairs, Mrs. Lacey presented "my son, Hugh," a fine looking man of some seventy-two inches. He relapsed into a diffident silence and only made monosyllable replies until, after several expressive and reminding looks from his mother, he blurted out:

CLEO WAS SHAKING OUT HER SATURATED DRESS SKIRT.

"Would you care for a row on the river?"

Cleo hid a smile at the perfunctory tone and manner, but she said graciously that she would, and as they went through the meadows and came out in sight of the river she remarked that it was hard to believe it was the same stream that flowed through the city where she lived.

"It is narrow, dirty and sluggish there," she said, "as different from this broad, beautiful stream as—well, as the city is from the country."

His stiffness relaxed a little. He loved the country and the river. When he reached the landing and was pushing off the rowboat, he said reluctantly:

"Do you care to row?"

"No," she replied. "I am not much of an oarsman, and—well, I'm afraid I am too lazy to enjoy it. I'd rather you'd have all the hard work."

He began to acknowledge that his mother was right in her estimate of this sensible girl. His long, even strokes carried them swiftly upstream. Her admiration of the scenery was so genuine that he felt pride in showing her still further beauties of the locality.

"There is a little stream that branches off from this one that goes through a fine stretch of woods," he remarked. "It's quite shallow, but I guess we can make it."

But when they had gone some distance up the little tributary he found it would be necessary to pole. He stood in the bow and worked vigorously for some moments. At last, after a mighty shove, the boat shot from the sandy bottom into deeper water. There was a splash and a little cry of amused dismay. Quickly turning, he saw that he had sent a goodly supply of water into the boat and that Cleo was shaking out her saturated dress skirt.

"Oh," he cried, "I forgot all about your being in that boat. I"—

She gave a wicked little laugh.

"I ought to feel complimented, Mr. Lacey, since you were averse to my society this afternoon."

A warm wave of color flushed his face.

"I overheard your mother's orders to you," she continued.

He gave an embarrassed little laugh not free from amusement.

"I wonder," he said, "what the men on the farm would say if they knew I took a girl out rowing and nearly tipped her over in four inches of water. You won't take cold?" he asked anxiously.

"Oh, no," she protested.

"But your dress, is it spoiled?"

"I have re-enforcements in the way of skirts."

"Won't it wash?" he asked ruefully.

"Yes, and shrink too."

"What can you do?" he asked in evident concern. Won't it let down or something?"

"Well, I think a French hem will make it all right."

"A French hem!" he exclaimed. "What in the world is that?"

"You'll see me making one for the next few days, but it's too bad you haven't a sister, Mr. Lacey. If you had one you'd have a better opinion of girls and you'd know what a French hem is."

"If I had a sister," he said earnestly, "I'd like her to be like you."

Cleo's eyes sparkled at the ingenuousness of the big, awkward man.

"You're sure you don't mind about the skirt?" he persisted as they walked through the meadow again.

"Not at all," she declared in a convincing tone.

"Then maybe you'll go again tomorrow afternoon," he said anxiously, "and let me show you"—

"That you can remember I'm in the boat?" she laughed. "Yes, I'd like very much to go again."

Farm work droned, for it was August, between cultivating and harvesting, so Hugh was not very busy. He paused next morning by the old cherry tree, where Cleo sat with her work.

"Is that the French hem you are making?" he asked interestedly.

"Yes, it's the French hem."

"Then I am going to watch you," he declared, sitting down beside her.

In the afternoon there was a longer ride up the river, and the next morning work was resumed on the French hem, with Hugh in attendance; in the afternoon the river. At twilight he must show her how lovely the shadows would be by moonlight. This became the regular programme for each day of Cleo's stay.

"I am afraid," remarked Mrs. Lacey to Hugh one night, "that Cleo won't finish that French hem in time to get much good out of the skirt this season."

"I am very anxious for her to finish it," he replied gravely, "and yet I am afraid for the time to come too."

"Why?" asked his mother in surprise.

He was silent for a moment, then he looked at her with shining eyes.

"Because," he said softly, "when she takes the last stitch she is going to tell me something, something I long to know."

"Cleo," said Mrs. Lacey later that evening as they walked together in the old fashioned garden, "why are you so long in finishing that French hem?"

Cleo looked quickly at the older woman's face. Something she read there assured her that Hugh had confided in her.

"Oh!" she said, with a little gasp. "Weren't you ever so happy in the thought of something that was coming that you just loved to put it off? Don't tell Hugh, but I am going to finish it tomorrow."

"And the last stitch"—

"Will be a love knot," smiled Cleo.

Dynasties of China.

There have been twenty-two dynasties in China, the royal history of this country being better ascertained than that of any other which reaches back to ancient times. With some few breaks, the Chinese have had a regular succession of sovereigns since Fuhhi, who, the Chinese say, reigned from B. C. 2852 to 2737. According to Chinese tradition, Fuhhi was no less a personage than the Noah of the Scriptures, who, after leaving his ark on Mount Ararat, traveled east and founded the Chinese empire. Chinese history asserts that several of their early monarchs ruled for over a century each, one reigning over China for 115 years, another for 102, another for 100, and so on. It is considered probable by historians that these figures represent rather dynasties than the reigns of individual sovereigns. China has had in almost direct descent, with no more than two or three breaks in the history of the royal family, thirty-three sovereigns, ninety-two emperors, two Tartar rulers, six Mogul emperors and three empresses.

Why Bees Work In the Dark.

Bees go out all day gathering honey, and work at night in the hive, building their combs as perfectly as if an electric light shone there all the time. "Why do they prefer to work in the dark?" is often asked. Every one knows that honey is a liquid with no solid sugar in it. After standing it gradually assumes a crystalline appearance or granulates and ultimately becomes a solid mass. Honey has been experimentally inclosed in well corked flasks, some of which were kept in perfect darkness, while the others were exposed to the light. The result was that the portion exposed to the light soon crystallized, while that kept in the dark remained unchanged. Hence we see why the bees are so careful to obscure the glass windows which are placed in their hives. The existence of the young depends on the liquidity of the saccharine food presented to them, and if light were allowed access to this it would in all probability prove fatal to the inmates of the hive.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

TED'S GHOST PARTY

By CHARLES FREEMAN

Copyright, 1906, by E. C. Parcells

John Ellison slowly descended from the carriage and turned toward the house. He walked slowly and with the bearing of a man utterly dejected. Nettie, watching him from the veranda, dropped her work and ran toward him.

"Was it any better today?" she asked anxiously. Her father shook his head.

"The day force went out when they came to work," he said. "The night force stopped work about 2 o'clock this morning."

"Don't you think that Ted could help?" she pleaded. "He knows the men so well."

"I told Raymond that I would not have him about the works again," said the old man bitterly. "Have you broken your pledge?"

"I have not seen him since that night," she declared, "but I do think he could do you so much good, father."

Ellison pushed her aside with gentle roughness and passed on up the walk. Nettie looked after him for a moment, then, with a sigh, followed the bowed figure into the house.

When the big contract had come there had been much jubilation. It was not alone that the completion of the contract meant a large sum of money; it was the work that the successful termination of this job would bring.

Then Ted Raymond, head draftsman in the pattern room, had asked for Nettie's hand and had been refused her father's consent. He had been dismissed, and since then everything had seemed to go wrong.

There had been a strike of the workmen, and when the strikers had been replaced with new men the newcomers had refused to remain in the plant, declaring it to be haunted.

The engineer employed to replace the striker had disappeared after the first night's work, and it was declared that he had been thrown into the furnace.

Night after night his phantom form could be seen hovering in the smoke and steam from the stack and exhaust pipes, and no man dared remain, the fear of the night shift communicating itself to the day force.

Raymond always had a good influence over the men, and Nettie felt certain that he would be able to adjust matters, but she had given her pledge not even to speak to him, and she could not urge him to take up the work.

It was late that night and Nettie was combing her hair when there came a gentle tap on the door, and she opened it to admit her father. She was shocked at the change that had come over him in the few hours since dinner. His face was seamed with furrows and his form stooped with care.

"I have been thinking over what you said," he began without preface as she assisted him to a chair. "I do not want to break my word, but absolute ruin stares me in the face. If Raymond can stop this fear of the supernatural in the men I will take back what I said and accept him as my son-in-law. Will you send him to me in the morning?"

"Are things as bad as that?" she asked. Ellison nodded.

"Unless I can obtain a permanent force by the end of the week," he said, "it will be impossible to complete this contract in time."

"And this is only Tuesday," she mused. "Ted can do it."

Ellison went away comforted. Apart from what he termed his presumption, he liked the man with his clean cut incisive manner and quick comprehension. Somehow he felt that herein lay his solution.

The next day there was consternation in the strikers' camp. The pickets reported that Ted had been made superintendent of the works. They liked him, but also they feared him.

That night gave Ted his first view of the specter. He remained with the night shift, and shortly after midnight there was a cry of alarm in the yard, and he rushed out to find the men all staring at the huge smokestack.

There in the swirling wreaths of smoke floated the dead engineer's image. Once or twice the specter vanished, only to reappear again, and for twenty minutes the men stared. Then, as if moved by a single impulse, they went to their lockers, and an hour later Ted and the old watchman were left alone in the yard.

The day shift went to work, as usual, but it was not long before the men grew uneasy. There were no apparitions in the daytime, but they felt nervous at the thought that the spirit of the murdered man hovered over the works.

At the noon hour they talked it over, and when the whistle blew for the return to work they went to the office in a body. They found Ted busy with some bits of glass covered with red paint. He looked up as the spokesman entered.

"Better make it short," he said quietly. "I suppose you do not want to keep on working in a haunted foundry."

"That's right," declared the leader. "We can't stand it."

"Think you can hold out through the afternoon?" he asked. "We are going to give a little ghost party tonight. Keep at it until knock-off time comes, and the two shifts will have supper together."

"Won't that ghost be around tonight?" demanded the leader suspiciously. "It may be all foolishness, but you saw it yourself last night."

"I hope to again this evening," he said. "That is where the fun will come. Like to be a ghost yourself tonight?"

Something in Ted's manner convinced the committee. The members went out into the yard and advised a return to work. All the afternoon there was an evident dislike of going into dark corners alone, and the engineer shivered every time the draft made the furnace roar, but they all stuck to the work and shared in the party at 6 o'clock.

"It will be dark enough by 9 to have the party," declared Ted. "When the whistle blows come into the yard and don't be afraid."

Just before 9 Nettie and her father came whirling up, and a few minutes later the whistle blew its summons. The men trooped into the yard and gathered about in little knots, whispering to themselves. Presently from the stack there arose a dense white smoke, and almost immediately the ghost of the dead engineer appeared. With a cry the men drew together, and a moment later Madison the spokesman of the morning, came toward Ted.

"The boys want to know if you are going to keep your word," he said roughly. "You said you was going to fix that ghost."

"So I am," said Ted evenly. "I said, too, that I was going to make a ghost of you. Look up."

With a shriek Madison fell to the ground, writhing in terror. There in the smoke wreaths was his own face. Ted's face followed and in turn a dozen of the others. Then the light died away and Ted mounted the steps of the office.

"Boys," he said in a voice that penetrated every part of the yard, "I promised you that I would lay that ghost. I think I have done so. It was a clever stage trick. The strikers are using Jones' hall across the street for their meetings. You can see that the tower is about level with the stack. When fresh coal was put on and the smoke was heavy it acted as a screen for a magic lantern in the tower. That was all there was to it. When they went up to work the lantern tonight I had the police there to catch them, and my own man worked the lantern for this little seance. One of the men they caught was the engineer himself. He is no more dead than I am. Are you satisfied to go back to work? We have a big contract, and I want to know that you boys will stick."

"You bet we will!" came the chorus, and Ted turned to Nettie.

"Let's go over to the house and have our own celebration," he suggested.

Water Butterflies.

Real water butterflies spread their lovely wings in the clear wavelets of the blue Mediterranean. Their scientific name is pteropoda, or wing footed. The commonest is perhaps the "boat butterfly." His body seems formed round a tiny brown kernel, the size of a grain of wheat, and is covered with a shell soft as gristle and almost transparent. His wings are large, round and clear as glass—so clear that before they can be examined they must be put in a saucer of water against a black ground. The shell is so loose that a mere touch separates it from the body. All the sea butterflies have on their tongues rows of strong pointed hooks. They are all flesh eaters. It is wonderful to watch through the transparent shell and almost equally transparent body the motions of the heart. These butterflies lay eggs, just like the land ones, and, like the land ones, are fond of warmth and light.

Treating Open Wounds.

In the treatment of open wounds, where there has been surface injury only and the discharge has not been great, much benefit has been found to follow the simple plan of treatment here described. The part is well washed with warm water. It is patted dry. Then it is very freely covered with boric acid powder. Over all is laid a piece of linen. Now adhesive plaster is cut into strips so long that they can go right across the linen and be attached to the healthy skin. By means of six or more of such strips the linen is securely fixed. Over this is placed a piece of cotton wool. Finally the part is neatly bandaged. Practically the air is now excluded from the sore part, and this is the reason for whatever good may result. The dressings are removed at the end of seven or ten days. The part is washed, then treated as before.

GEE WHIZ!

Here's a Hot One Handed Out by Spangler.

L. I. Spangler, of York, who claims he obtains his knowledge direct from the Almighty, has issued his prophecies for 1907.

His 1907 bulletin says Russia will lose its Czar and Turkey its Sultan and that all Kings of the nations will fall. He asserts there will be fights and disturbances in the religious world and that the end of the world will be within two years; revolution will spread throughout the land. Many rulers and capitalists will hang themselves on account of financial troubles. Tidal waves will destroy seaboard towns, he declares; islands will disappear, mountains will be found missing. Mothers-in-law will be arrayed against daughters-in-law. There will be kitchen upheavals and families will be unable to obtain help. In 1908 the stars will fall. King Edward will pass away as the last King of England. New York will be destroyed by fire.

Our advice is keep a cool head, eat three hearty meals a day, take a full night's rest. Don't worry, and you will outlive Spangler. Because a man makes an easy guess now and then is no sign that he is a prophet. The prophet business is played out at this age.

Garrett County Telephone Co. Officers.

The stockholders of the Garrett county Telephone Company held their annual meeting at Friendsville on Monday of this week when the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, W. A. Smith; secretary and treasurer, James Beeghly; directors, W. A. Smith, Madison Durst, S. P. Specht, C. C. Frankhouser, C. V. Guard, M. Mattingly, E. Vansickle. The company is in good condition financially and is making some extensive improvements, among them being an entirely new line from Oakland to Terra Alta and intermediate points, thus giving better service to all points west.

FOUR ECLIPSES WILL OCCUR

Sun and Moon Will Each Be Hidden Twice During This Year.

Astronomical phenomena for the year 1907 will embrace four eclipses, two of the sun and two of the moon. The total eclipse of the sun, January 13, invisible in the United States, will be observed as a partial eclipse throughout the greater part of Asia, the path of totality passing from Russia at sunrise across an almost inaccessible portion of Siberia, at sunset.

A partial eclipse of the moon, January 29, will be partly visible in the United States, the moon setting eclipsed as seen from the greater portion of this country. The beginning of this lunar eclipse will be visible generally all through North America, the Pacific Ocean, Central Asia and Australia. The end will be visible in Northwest America, the Pacific Ocean, Asia, Australia, Central and Eastern Europe.

There will be an annual eclipse of the sun July 10, visible in all of North America and parts of the Atlantic and Pacific Ocean, and just at sunset on the west coast of Africa.

The most interesting phenomena of this year, and the one of most scientific value, will be the transit of the planet Mercury on the morning of November 14, which will be generally visible in the United States, the sun rising with the little planet plainly visible across the disk of the great king of day. This phenomenon will be generally visible in Europe, Africa, Western and Central Asia, Western Austria, and South America.

The theory of Mercury's movements has always been a source of trouble to astronomers, even in Laland's time. It is said the planet seems to exist for no other purpose than to throw discredit on astronomers. Therefore the transit next fall will be watched with unusual scientific interest.

BLOCK OPERATORS TO BE LICENSED

Col. Pearre's Bill Now Pending in the House.

THE BILL IS EXCITING INTEREST

Was Matured After Consultation with Railroad Officials and Telegraph Operators—Confident of Action on the Measure.

On December 3, nearly a month before the Terra Cotta railroad accident, Hon. George A. Pearre, Representative in Congress from the Sixth Maryland district, introduced into the House a bill to regulate the employment of block-signal telegraph operators on interstate roads. This bill is somewhat startling in the novelty of one of its features, and its constitutionality, if it should be enacted, would, doubtless, be attacked by the railroad companies. Whether it would run the gauntlet of the courts is an open question. The bill is, in effect, intended to place these employes of railroads in the Government classified service. The bill provides:

That on and after the 1st day of January, 1907, all telegraph operators engaged in the occupation of signaling trains by what is termed the block signal, or receiving and transmitting to trains telegraphic train orders issued by the superintendent and other officers of all railroads in the United States engaged in interstate commerce, shall pass an examination prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission to determine the mental and technical fitness of said applicants, and said commission shall issue a license to said applicants for such examination to engage in such work if they pass the tests.

Railroad companies desiring to employ telegraphers would, under this bill, have to apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a list of eligibles. The bill, however, does not apply to persons who have been engaged in block-signal telegraphic work for three years.

The penalty upon railroad companies for violation of the law is a fine of not more than $5,000. Individuals who disobey the law are subject to fine and imprisonment.

As to the propriety of the clause in the bill which prohibits working these operators longer than eight hours in one day, there can only be general assent. No railroad telegraph operator engaged in signaling trains or sending or receiving telegraphic train orders should be compelled to work more than eight hours a day. The mind and all the faculties of the railroad operator must be on the alert. Upon his wakefulness, his memory and the accuracy of his observation depend the safety of the people on the trains. It is essential that the minds and bodies of men laboring under these responsibilities should not be over tasked. It is not uncommon to work these men 12 hours at a stretch, and there is no telling how many lives have been lost by the forgetfulness or inattention of men who have been wearied and their faculties dulled by long hours at work. This fact has been recognized by the Legislature of Maryland, and at the session of 1906 a law was enacted—Chapter 454 of the acts of that session—to prohibit the employment of a block-signal operator for more than eight hours in any 24 consecutive hours. This is now the law of Maryland, and it should be the law of the District of Columbia and of every State in the Union. If Congress is competent to do it, then it should be done by Congress. Perhaps Congress has the same authority to do this that it had to require airbrakes and automatic couplers and to abolish stoves.

Mr. Pearre's bill not only prohibits the companies from employing telegraphers more than eight hours a day, but prohibits telegraphers from working for a longer time. It is questionable whether some sort of limitation should not be put upon the hours of enginemen It is just as important for them to be alert and wideawake as it is for telegraphers. Engineer Hildebrand, who was on the locomotive that caused the Terra Cotta disaster, testified that he had had no sleep, except two periods of four and a half hours each, within 48 hours. It is true that he denied that he was any the worse for this, but that does not seem reasonable. The engineer gets extra pay for extra hours, and he does not always regard long hours as a hardship, but it may imperil the safety of passengers. It cannot be that a man who has had one night's sleep in two whole days is at his best, and he should not be permitted to endanger life in order to enlarge his pay check any more than the railroad company should do it to save expense. The recent meeting of representatives of railroad engineers and firemen in Chicago had under consideration a demand for an eight-hour day. If such a demand is made and the railroad companies accede to it, it may promote the safety of travel and the prosperity of the railroads.

All persons having accounts with the undersigned and who have not made satisfactory arrangements for their payment can settle the same by calling upon L. D. Thrasher, at Deer Park, Md., before the 6th day of December. After that date I shall proceed by law to collect the same. Thanking all for past favors, I am,

DR. G. L. LININGER.

BITTINGER.

January has thus far been extremely mild, but the public roads have become well nigh impassible on account of the mud, and one can scarcely go out with any degree of comfort.

W. A. Althers, of Pocahontas, Pa., is spending this week with friends in this neighborhood.

The Mutual Telephone Company held their regular annual meeting here on last Saturday afternoon, but were unable to dispose of all their business and called a second meeting for Monday at which meeting all business was disposed of.

Miss Sadie Sechler, of St. Paul, Pa., is visiting her brother, Charles Sechler, at this place this week.

Joel Orendorf butchered a fine hog last Saturday. The animal dressed four hundred and eighty-eight pounds.

Mrs. J. B. Shoup and three grand daughters arrived here last Friday from Enochsville, N. C., and expect to remain here for some time.

The councils of the Lutheran congregations at this place and Meadow Mountain have called Rev. Cunz, of Hagerstown, Md., to preach a trial sermon at Bittinger on Sunday evening, January 13th, and at Meadow Mountain on the same day, in the morning. It is desired that all members of these congregations be present at the services.

Nelson I. Custer, of McHenry, was seen in this village last Monday.

Mahlon Brenneman left here last Monday morning for his farm near McHenry, where he contemplates locating permanently.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44 5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

THE LATE E. F. DROEGE.

A Warm Personal Friend Contributes A Memorial.

So much of merit, already widely published upon the character of this valued citizen and esteemed gentleman, I beg space in your columns for this additional notice from the standpoint of a friend of more than three decades.

Mr. Emil Frederick Droege was born in Bremen, Germany, April 20th, 1839, and died at Deer Park, Maryland, December 29th, 1906. Before attaining the age of majority he emigrated from his native country and landed in the city of New York in 1856, ready to embark in the business world. But the ruling element of his mind and pursuit of better health induced him to choose a rural life, and after a brief experience of three years in the American metropolis, he settled in the year 1859 in the village of Deer Park, then in Allegany but now in Garrett county, Maryland, where he built his home and established himself for life. Here he identified himself in no uncertain way with the best interest and surest progress of his village and county and founded deeply in the public estimate the reputation of an upright and enterprising citizen. He was prevailed upon to accept the appointment and administer the functions of magistrate in the Deer Park district, and, with a mind sound in the principles of law and an accurate conception of justice, his decisions were rarely if ever reversed by the higher courts in an administration of twenty years, covering many vexing and complex cases.

He read thoughtfully and informed himself liberally upon topics of public concern, both foreign and domestic, but at all times was particularly versed in the happenings and erudition of the German people. But the pressure and excitement of passing affairs were not allowed to infringe or lessen those higher duties and observances of the christian. The baptismal rites conferred upon him in infancy openly before men he caused to be confirmed in mature manhood and lived in reality a scion that grew to fruitage in the Lutheran faith.

In his tastefully chosen and rationally regulated home, commanding a prominence in the picturesque village and salubrious climate of Deer Park, Mr. Droege ever experienced the sweetest pleasures sought by him in life. His family circle was one of delightful companionship and mutual benefit, and there he and his devoted wife, fixed well and lastingly in the minds and hearts of a family of four sons and one daughter those loftier principles highest and ripest upon the parent tree. His oldest son, Albert, rose rapidly from station to station in railroad progress to that of Division Superintendent of the New York, New Haven and Hartford railway system. One son is a lawyer of New York city and the other two sons occupy places of trust and usefulness.

These five children, all grown, with their estimable mother, survives Mr. Droege and have the heritage of his unselfish devotion, his wise example and spotless name.

The interment was at Deer Park marked by the simplicity he so much preferred and directed to be observed.

His end was but the reflex of a serene evening when the day is done, and was reached less through the torture of a specific malady than, as it were, a gradual rise and encroachment of a tide in nature on which he sank in rest, and, in the mystical moment, passed with its ebb beyond the cloud out into the shining.

A TREMENDOUS LANDSLIDE.

Earth, Rocks, and Trees Fell on B. & O. Tracks and Greatly Delayed Traffic.

Saturday evening about eight o'clock hundreds of tons of earth, rocks and trees buried the tracks of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad near Everett's Tunnel, a mile or two west of Bloomington, when the mountain side above slipped down without a moment's warning, catching an eastbound helper engine and almost completely covering it. The engineer and fireman escaped from their predicament by jumping.

The engine being on the track adjoining the hillside acted as a shield to some extent and prevented much of the earth from going onto the adjoining track and thus kept the way open afte the debris had been shoveled off.

All trains both east and west Saturday night were abandoned, being detoured over the tracks of the Western Maryland Railroad from Cumberland on the east and Grafton on the west.

In Menory of W. H. Chadderton.

To the Editor of The Republican.

Through the columns of your paper Mrs. Jane Chadderton, widow of the late Wm. H. Chadderton, desires to express her deep and heartfelt gratitude to all the kind friends of Deer Park and her neighbors near her home, who so nobly came to her bereaved home and with tears and sympathy tried to calm her troubled soul, in this the saddest of her earthly experience. For them all she asks Heaven's richest blessings for their words of condolence and kind ministrations to a heart that no earthly joys can ever heal, and with the fervent prayer that she may meet them all in a fairer clime than this, in a Land far beyond the stars, where she hopes to meet meet the one that was dearer to her than any earthly treasure.

In connection with the above the writer wishes to add his tribute of the high regard and esteem he had for the one that came to such an untimely end.

It was the pleasure of the one who pens this humble tribute to the memory of Wm. H. Chadderton, to say we had known him for twenty-five or thirty years, and in all those years, never a jar to the pleasant and social intercourse as neighbors and friends. He at all times greeted me with a genial kindness and fraternal cordiality and his urbane manner made him friends among all men of character and worth. His high sense of honor and strict attention to business won for him the confidence of the best people of our county where he was known. His word in business transactions was as good as his bond. Attentive to business and strict in his dealings, but liberal to all claims for charity, hospitable in his home, presided over by his faithful companion, one of the neatest and frugal matrons of this county.

As is well known he was the trusted manager of that prince of enterprise that gives to the laboring class of this community work all the year round, the magnificent estate of "Altamont Springs Farm" or "Truesdell Heights." Mr. Chadderton, as manager, was held in the highest esteem by Col. George Truesdell paying out for him thousands of dollars each month and his employees always got their just dues and had the warmest regard for their manager.

We close in saying District No. 10 and Garrett county has lost of one of its best citizens, his church its most loyal members his party a true patriot, his neighbors a sincere friend, and lastly his wife a loving husband, his only son an indulgent father, and the writer one of his best friends. Peace to his ashes.

A FRIEND.

Good People Are Objecting to Play.

There is a good sized kick among the better class of people of this borough over the coming of the play "A Break for Liberty," that is billed for Donges theatre for Saturday night, of this week. The management of the play announces with much gusto that it is based upon the escape of the Biddle Brothers from the Allegheny county jail a few years ago, and that it fully exploits the part that the jailer's wife played in that escape. They consider it a play that is demoralizing and one that will have a bad effect upon the minds of the young. A number of the authorities of nearby towns have refused to allow the show to take place in their bailiwicks, and Burgess Reed has been requested to not allow its production here.

The above clipping taken from the Meyersdale Republican of last week, refers to the show which has been advertised to appear in Oakland on Friday evening of this week. Viewed from the standpoint taken by our contemporary over in Pennsylvania the production should be prohibited not only in that State but in every section of the country. Such shows are not elevating to the minds and morals of any community and we trust that in the near future something may be done by legislation or otherwise to drive all questionable productions from the stage.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

Garrett county is the only county in the State of Maryland which has less than nine months of school.

The average cost of each student enrolled last year in this county was $9.57.

There is a strong demand by the teachers throughout the county for an article written upon Primary Work. How can the children be best taught? Have you any successful methods in teaching any branch to them? If so, send them in so that other teachers may learn of them.

The idea of having a column in the county papers conducted by the teachers has received many flattering comments from newspapers published in other parts of this and other states. Several of them have written an article about the one which is being conducted by the teachers of this county, and each of them urge their teachers to start a similar venture. The teachers of Somerset county, Pennsylvania, are among the first to start a movement for such a column on education. Everyone feels sure that this movement here is pregnant with the most excellent results for the schools of this county.

The following article has been received for publication in the series:

TEACHING U. S. HISTORY.

Many reasons can be given why United States History should be studied in the public schools. It is a study which is fascinating to many pupils and the question for the teacher arises "How can I make it so?" Here is a plan which I find can be used successfully for teaching advanced grades:

If you turn to your history you will find it beginning with Columbus, his life, work and death. Following him come the Cabots and Northmen and many other explorers and discoverers of different nationalities, dates, purposes and results, such as Ponce De Leon, DeSoto, Cartier, Cabeza DeVaca, Hudson and others. Now it is impossible to remember the works of all these different men unless you have some plan of doing so. Otherwise it is all a jumble covering many pages of history which the pupil is unable to straighten out. Let us illustrate the plan by Columbus: 1, name of explorer, Columbus; 2, date, 1492; 3, nationality, Italian, in service of Spain; 4, purpose, to find a new route to the Indies; 5, what discovered, America; 6, results, made known a new continent. Other results can be mentioned. Each explorer can be taken in this way and everything in the book be brought out in connection with the outline. Thus a knowledge of all the petty facts concerning each man will be remembered, but the most important will become fixed.

I would have my pupils prepare such an outline because, 1st, it will cause more research and closer attention; 2d, by writing it, it will become more firmly fixed in their minds. The value of the teacher now shows itself very plainly. Many are the byways leading from the true road of history. The teacher's duty is to require this work and keep the pupils on the proper track.

The Revolutionary and Civil Wars are two important factors is history and can easily, and may, I say, be successfully taught by campaigns. During the Revolution of course Washington, as every school boy will tell you, is the foremost general. Let the pupil outline his campaign from the beginning to the end of the war. Since he is Commander-in-Chief, the minor generals can easily be brought out and the campaigns of the foremost be traced. Likewise treat sevaral of the British generals.

The Union plans for the Civil War was: 1, to blockade the southern ports in order to cut off supplies from the south; 2, to capture Richmond; 3, to open the lower Mississippi, Cumberland and Tennessee Rivers then closed for navigation by the Confederates; 4, to break the Confederate line in the west, march eastward and thence to Virginia, thus breaking up the whole Confederacy. Let the pupil trace the campaigns of such men as Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Johnston, Lee, Jackson and others at the discretion of the teacher, not forgetting the plan of the war. We find Grant beginning with the third plan, capturing Forts Henry and Donelson and winning the battles of Pittsburg Landing and Island Number Ten during the first year of the war. This plan is continued by moving against Vicksburg the second year and capturing it with Fort Hudson the third year, thus completing this plan of the war. The remainder of his campaign during the fourth year can easily be traced. I am sure that by tracing generals of both the North and the South an excellent knowledge of the war can be gained.

Much of the teaching of history, as well as all other branches, depends upon the teacher. Often I have heard teachers exclaim, "how well school went today." The secret of this is that the teacher was interested in the work and the pupils then could not help being themselves interested.

Get right into your work, add enthusiasm and success will crown your efforts.

CONTRIBUTION No. 5.

HOYES.

Mud and wafer are both very plentiful in our town, therefore boating has become quite popular.

Misses Sadie and Freda DeWitt and Auburn Smith and Mr. D. Earle Smith spent Sunday afternoon with Miss Bernadette Mattingly.

Mr. Colonel DeWitt, after spending several days in Friendsville, returned Friday evening.

Miss Malvie Wilburn returned last week after spending several months near Deer Park with her sister, Mrs. Frank DeWitt.

We are very sorry to state that Rev. Hudson's little daughter is seriously ill with pneumonia. We hope for her speedy recover.

Mr. and Mrs. George E. Bishoff have returned from Grantsville.

Mr. James Willison, J. C. Orrick's traveling salesman from Cumberland, spent Wednesday night at this place.

Mr. P. R. Savage spent a short while in Hoyes last Sunday.

Mr. S. T. Cunningham was in our town several days this week.

Miss Bertha Custer returned to her home near here last Thursday.

We are glad to state that Mrs. Hannah DeWitt is still improving.

Died.

BRYDON—On Sunday, January 13th, 1907, in Baltimore, Rhoda C. Brydon, in the 58th year of her age, beloved wife of Edward R. Brydon. Mrs. Brydon's funeral occurred on Tuesday from her late home in Baltimore. She was the sister-in-law of Mr. William B. Brydon, of Bloomington, and was well known in parts of Garrett and Allegany counties.

BRADLEY—Mrs. Ellen Bradley, widow of the late John Bradley, of Oakland, died in a Baltimore City hospital on last Monday morning at 9 o'clock after an illness of two years or more of heart disease. Her remains were taken to Cincinnati, Ohio, on Tuesday, accompanied by her two sons, Joseph and George Bradley. Mrs. Bradley was a member of the Oakland Catholic church and was held in high esteem by her acquaintances. Her funeral occurred yesterday.

WANTED—A good boy to take out orders and make himself useful. Apply to Oakland Model Steam Bakery.

MARYLAND IS WITHOUT DEBT.

In Fact Has a Balance on the Credit Side.

Annapolis, Md., Jan. 15.—In his annual report for the fiscal year ended September 30, submitted yesterday to Governor Warfield, Dr. Gordon T. Atkinson, state conptroller, shows that Maryland is not only practically without a public debt, but has a large balance on the credit side of the ledger. "As a matter of fact," says the Comptroller, "the premuim on the Northern Central Railway Company annuity of $1,500,000 would more than cancel the entire state debt."

This condition in the State's finances was brought about by the sale of the state's stock in the Washington Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, at a price greater than was thought by many it would ever bring. Dr. Atkinson's report thus handles this transaction:

The gross debt of the state at the close of the fiscal year ended September 30, 1905, was $8,526,926.13. On September 30, 1906, it was $6,167,926,13. The net debt of the state on September 30, 1905, was $3,087,969.13, and the net debt on September 30, 1906, was only $838,201.41.

No mention is made of the insane asylum 3½ per cent. loan of $100,000. This loan was canceled by an exchange of the entire loan for a part of the state's interest in the stock of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in April last. You will also find that the Penitentiary 3½ per cent. loan is reduced from $500,000 to $248,000 by a like exchange, while the consolidated 3 per cent loan of 1899 was reduced from $5,401,926.13 to $3,253,926.13 by a like exchange.

In Memoriam.

Della, youngest daughter of P. P. Gortner, died at the home of her parents, Dec. 27, 1906, aged 10 years, 7 months and 11 days. Della was a bright child and was loved by all who knew her. She attended church and Sunday school, and was a scholar of the Swan Meadow school, and is greatly missed by her teacher and schoolmates as she always attended regularly, and took great interest in her studies. She leaves to mourn her sad loss a father, mother, one sister, three brothers and a host of friends. Services were held by Rev. John Koser, of Eglon, W. Va., and she was laid to rest Friday, Dec. 28, in the cemetery near her home.

Dearest Della, thou hast left us;
Here our loss we deeply feel—
But 'tis God that has bereft us,
He can all our sorrows heal.

By Thy hand the boon was given
Thou hast taken but Thine own—
Lord of earth and God of heaven,
Ever more Thy will be done.

The International Sunday School Lesson.

First Quarter. Lesson III. Genesis iii, 1-6; 13-14. January 20, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

Man's Sin and God's Promise.

Genesis "Third" is a target fairly shot through, not only with the darts of a vulgar infidelity, but the well-aimed arrows of a scholarly criticism. But after all, the chapter is unharmed. It stands alone in literature. It is helpful toward the solution of an occult problem —the origin of evil. By some it is accepted as literal history; by others as a vivid pictorial and poetical description of man's early struggle with evil.

Under either interpretation, Adam and Eve are represented as nobly endowed. They had a happy environment, and were under the direct and daily tutelage of their Maker. But they were on probation. In Eden the problem was solving whether they would persist in choosing to obey God or not. A test was given. It was simple, but adequate, and exactly suited to their estate. Of the fruit of one attractive and conspicuously-located tree they were forbidden. The prohibition was so explicit, peremptory, and oft-repeated that inadvertence was out of the question. "Thou shalt not!" was fairly written upon the leaves of the tree. Persistent abstinence was a visible and potent sign to God and angels, good and evil, of their conscious and voluntary loyalty to God. Under this Adamic covenant God stood ready for His part to supply grace sufficient; but Adam, on his side, must choose to keep obeying God.

We have no means of knowing how long the happy Eden life continued. The true idea of Adam's state is probably that which places him midway between the savage and the sage. He was a laborer, suffered not the excessive weariness and vexation incident to labor now. He was busy getting "dominion," subduing the triple kingdoms—earth, air, water, vegetable, animal, mineral. In the evening hour, when activities cease and the human heart is ever most impressible, he enjoyed immediate communion with his Creator, who corrected his mistakes and inspired him with new courage and love.

At length, at some period when man's tutelage was far enough advanced to make his chances for enduring the ordeal most favorable, a crucial test was permitted. The outcome of the ordeal was not predestinated defeat. Adam had a good fighting chance. He might have persisted in his love, trust, obedience toward God. He ought to have. The odds were not against him. He had had overmastering examples of God's goodness, constancy, wisdom, love. He ought to have been loyal.

An overwhelming vanity determines man to lift himself in the scales of being, even if he must needs make the staircase out of the broken commandments of a loving Heavenly Father.

The deed was done already in subjective intent, in the deliberate and pleasurable entertainment of the suggestion of doing it. Flesh and eye had already lusted, and pride had put the finishing touch. The manual act of reaching, touching, plucking, was only the objective complement of the mental determination, the other hemisphere of the full, black orb of sin which rolled on Adam with its crushing weight.

Their eyes were opened, but not to see themselves exalted to the lofty plain of their Maker, but fallen infinitely below the plane on which they were standing before. "The normal relation between soul and body was destroyed, so that the body ceased to be any longer a pure instrument of the spirit," So they were overwhelmed with their first sense of shame, and ceased to be "like unconscious, unembarrassed children."

Out of the shadows of Eden, in which, with a silly, ostrich-like instinct, they sought to hide themselves from the omniscience of their Maker, God called them. It was a fearful meeting. The reality of man's fall is evidenced by his changed bearing. The frankness of innocence is gone. When fairly cornered by his omniscient Prosecutor, with the historic cowardice of sin, he seeks to cast the blame directly upon the companion whom, up to that moment, he had loved devotedly and sheltered courageously, and indirectly upon the beneficent Being who had given her to him.

Across the densest gloom of this shattered paradise God let one ray of heavenly hope fall aslant: "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." The age-long strife just then beginning, with its varying fortunes, between the good and the evil seed, shall finally cease when the Man of Calvary puts His bitten heel upon the serpent's head.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Modernize this lesson. Translate it into the language of today.

* * * * *

Every boy and girl and older person can be shown to be standing under a tree of test. Destiny is deciding now by one's attitude toward God.

* * * * *

The chance of happy outcome are better and worse than those of Adam. Worse, because of an hereditary predisposition to a wrong choice. Better, because of the provisions of mercy. Where sin abounds, grace much more abounds.

* * * * *

Even now God's voice is ringing, "Son, daughter, give Me thine heart!" One does not need to run the whole gamut of sin to be lost. Merely declining to obey God is enough to exclude one His presence.

* * * * *

Picture the approach of the first night after the exciting novelty of their experience was wearing away; the twilight hour, when retrospection is natural; when and wants to be assured of some strong safeguard; just when Adam and Eve were feeling most orphaned, the Heavenly Father sought His erring children. He has been doing so ever since.

* * * * *

So, if the sinner feels a quickening of the conscience, a kindling of desire, it is God at work, and in the most opportune hour. It is the supreme dictate of practical wisdom to know one's opportunity, and improve it.

WASHINGTON CHAT.

Breezy, Newsy Notes From the Nation's Capitol.

By our special correspondent.

When the legislative, executive and judicial bill comes up before the Senate this week, the amendment to it providing for an increase in the salary of members of Congress from $5,000 to $7,000 a year, may not meet with a kindly reception, judging from the sentiment that exists in the upper House now. There is a feeling in that body to resent the plan of putting the burden in this matter on the Senate, after the House refused to assume the responsibility.

As is well known, when the bill was up in the House it failed of passing because members feared that their constituents might raise the cry of "salary grab" such as took place a number of years ago when the same proposition was made to increase the pay of Congressmen. It would seem, however, from the numerous letters received by different Representatives and which were written by their constituency, that the people as a whole, are not averse to having the pay of Congressmen increased and this consensus of opinion may have some effect in securing the adoption of the amendment. The opinions of the public press have also been carefully sought, the majority of papers being in favor of the increase, and these also, are expected to carry weight when voting time arrives in the Senate.

It is now safe to remark that the Smoot case is to be completely sidetracked at this session of Congress and some even predict that it will never be called up at any coming session. Many Senators would like to escape voting on the question but Senator Smoot, himself, is urging that a vote be taken and some consideration will have to be given to his request.

Early in the session when Senators Dubois and Burrows delivered themselves of fiery speeches for the unseating of the Utah Senator, it looked as if the case was to be brought to a focus then but nothing happened nor has anything transpired since which has had any bearing on the case either for or against. It was understood that one or two Senators were in readiness with speeches to defend Smoot but just why they remain silent is not explained by the "leaders."

It is difficult to estimate the amount of money, to say nothing of the time, that has been spent on this famous case. Witnesses on both sides have been paid a considerable sum in fees and traveling expenses and attorneys have been big gainers in a pecuniary way. Petitions against the seating of Senator Smoot continue to be received by the Senate committee having the case in charge, most of them coming from women's clubs and organizations. All are carefully stored away in the room provided for that purpose.

Carrie Nation of hatchet fame is in Washington. So far she has acted very ladylike and has confined herself to speech-making, preaching particularly against the lack of attention that Congress gives to ridding the historic Pennsylvania Avenue from the numerous electric signs located on the tops of high business buildings and which advertise various brands of beers and whiskies. She proposes to call upon rhe President to send a special message to Congress on the desecration of this famous thoroughfare and then intends to see that Congress acts upon the recommendations of reform to be made.

Mrs. Nation is in Washington to interview Postmaster General Cortelyou who refused to permit her publication called "The Hatchet" to pass through the mails on account of it being vulgar. So many vices of the Capital city have claimed her attention, however, that the real purpose of her visit has been overlooked.

Next to President Roosevelt, who is at work every moment he is in Executive offices, the busiest man in the White House is the President's Secretary, Mr. Loeb. Besides assisting the President in the reception of officials and visitors, he is required to read anywhere from three hundred to a thousand letters a day, not only read them but answer them, if not personally, by directing the several stenographers the nature of the replies to be made.

Most of the letters, of course, are intended for the President but he sees and answers only a few of the important ones, the others being signed by the Secretary. Every letter is answered but in most cases the fewest possible number of words is used, just enough to be polite and show the writer that the letter has received attention. Many people write letters to the President just to secure his autograph and are disappointed when the reply is signed by the Secretary.

There are communications on every conceivable subject. One man in Montana wants to sell the President a copper mine, another desires to give him an interest in a patent, a third wishes him to accept a box of pills while others write for advice and assistance in many ways. Thus it can be seen that the office of Secretary to the President is no "cinch."

President Roosevelt manifested considerable interest in the arrival at the White House of the medal and diploma recently awarded him by the Norwegian parliament. The diploma sets forth the whys and wherefores of the award and is a beautifully executed piece of work done on vellum. The actual prize itself, which will be a check for $40,000 has not yet been received. The prize medal is made of solid gold containing about $300 worth of the metal and is appropriately figured and lettered. On one side is a raised face of Nobel, the giver of the prize, and on the other side is a representation of two men fighting, with a third attempting to part them and make peace. The diploma and medal will be retained by the President but the amount of the check will be placed as the foundation for a fund to promote peace between capital and labor.

MISSOURI'S HIDDEN LAKE

A Remarkable Body of Water in the Heart of the Ozarks.

In Oregon county, Mo., and Fulton county, Ark., are grouped Grand gulf, Mammoth spring and Spring river. Grand gulf is the crowning wonder of the group. The shallow streams, about one-fourth of a mile distant from each other, flowing in the same direction over an elevated plateau, suddenly drop into canyons form a junction half a mile below, where they strike a mountian that has been tuneled by the action of the water, and the natural bridge thus formed is no less a curiosity and almost equal in size to the famous natural bridge of Virginia.

After passing through this mountain the united stream strikes another mountain and tunnels for several hundred feet and then spreads out into an immense underground lake, the area of which has never been ascertained. Many parties have entered the tunnel and picnics have been held by torchlight on the margin of the lake, but still it remains a mystery. No light can exist long over the bosom of the lake and nothing can be heard save the far-away rumble of the waters as they rush on.

This underground lake is a reservoir which supplies Mammoth spring, the largest spring in the world, with 60,000 cubic feet of water a minute. The most surprising feature in connection with this extraordinary natural curiosity is the fact that when these great canons are filled even to the arch of the natural bridge, hundreds of feet deep, the volume increased. Mammoth spring covers eighteen acres of ground 200 feet deep with crystal water.

IN THE RUSSIAN STYLE.

Curious National Customs Observed at a South Dakota Marriage.

A double wedding in the Russian colony at Rosedale, S. D., south of Alexandria, lasted through an entire day and into the evening. The names of the principals were Joseph Mandel and Katharine Hofer, and Michael Waldner and Katherine Gross.

The ceremony was begun in the morning in the little stone church, in which the old custom of the men and women sitting on opposite sides still prevails. The Russian priest delivered a long sermon, and at 11.20 o'clock he called the principals to the front of the edifice, the women going first and being followed by the young men. The ceremony proper was spoken in Russian, and lasted but a short time. It was followed by a prayer and a song and then brides and bride grooms returned to their separate seats.

The bridal costumes of the couples were very simple, the maidens wearing flanelette gowns with a handkerchief tied over their heads. The bridegrooms, however, were dressed a little more fastidiously, in that they wore regular wedding suits, chief of which was a long coat. A peculiarity about the coat is that it is worn by every bridegroom in the settlement, two coats being kept in the settlement in case of a double wedding, and whether the bridegroom is tall or short, large or small, the coat must do its duty.

With the ceremony over, the guests and the bridal couples went to the eating house, where a big dinner composed of noodle soup, bread, beef, sauerkraut, whiskey and wine was served. The women occupied one long table and the men another, but the bridal couples were allowed to sit together. With the dinner over came the interesting part of the ceremony, and that is the love scene which follows a Russian wedding. The company went to what is called the love room in one of the houses, where before the assembled crowd the brides aud bridegrooms sat with arms around each other, billing and cooing, oblivious to the comments and watchful eyes of the others. As a sort of break in the monotony for the brides one of the young ladies filled the aprons of the brides with peanuts and candy, which they munched with complacency as the joyous festivities proceeded. At nine o'clock the love scene broke up and the day of the wedding came to an end.

GRAND ISLAND GAME PRESERVE

Elk, Moose and Caribou, Pheasants and Grouse Found in Native State.

Excepting only Yellowstone Park, Grand Island, in Lake Superior, is the largest and most complete game preserve in the United States. Nestling in the water of the great inland sea, this picturesque native woodland, with rockbound shores, is a veritable gem of nature.

Grand Island resembles in shape a transposed outline of the state of Louisiana, but here the similarity ends. The island contains but 13,000 acres, or about twenty square miles. It is ten miles long and four miles wide.

Its unbroken forests of pine and hardwood have been converted into a game preserve in which nearly every species of game animal and bird native to this latitude can now be found in its native state. The physical nature of the island is especially favorable for the project.

Over half the coast line is bounded by perpendicular cliffs rising to an elevation of from forty to 350 feet above the level of Lake Superior, forming a perpetual barrier against escape. In some places along the coast line these minature mountain ranges are broken by deep ravines and gulches, which in most cases are sequestered valleys of singular loveliness.

Where these valleys open an exit to the lake, game fences have been built to prevent animals from gaining access to the mainland by swimming the channel in summer or crossing the ice in the winter season. At a point two and a half miles north of the southern extremity of the island a game fence twelve feet in height and extending east and west to the shore line has been built inclosing an area of about 8,000 acres, over which the animals roam at will.

Between two lofty ridges that traverse the island from the north to the south is a dense cedar swamp three miles long and one mile wide at its broadest point. This is the natural home of the caribou, which feed upon the dry, glutinous mixture commonly called reindeer moss and found in great quantities in this region.

The original herd of caribou was brought to the island three years ago from Deer Lake, Newfoundland. There were five animals in the herd. Like their near relatives, the moose, they are slow breeders, but grow to enormous size. There are probably a score of specimens of the moose family on Grand Island, one of which has attained its full growth, now being about fifteen years old, weighing 1,000 pounds. The moose were imported from Canada and northern Minnesota.

Other big game in the Grand Island preserve is a herd of elk. Originally it numbered eleven, but since brought to the island three years ago it has largely increased, the elk being a prolific breeder.

During certain seasons of the year men are employed by the company to carry on a war of extermination against the fox, mink and other small animals which prey upon the game birds. The beaver, however, is allowed to propagate, and many specimens have been brought to the island and given the freedom of its several streams. The native, or ruffled grouse, are plentiful in all parts of the preserve, and the spruce hen, a bird now almost extinct, is present in great numbers.—Outing.

LONG LIVE THE BOSS!

Municipal Ownership Would Make His Position Impregnable.

Referring to the recent announcement that 51,146 persons are on the payroll of New York city, the Newark Advertiser declares that in the event of municipal ownership of street railways, electric light and gas plants, ferries and other public utilities the city employees would constitute a political army that would make a change of administration impossible.

It recalls the fact that 25,000 city employees in Philadelphia kept Philadelphia in the hands of the corrupt Durham machine for years, and only a great popular uprising overthrew the grafters.

"If Durham had had control of the street railroads and other public utilities in Philadelphia through municipal ownership," it observes, "he could have laughed at popular uprisings. He would have been as absolute in his authority as the czar."

The point is well taken.

In other cities the political situation under public ownership would be as it would in Philadelphia and New York.

Bosses may be overthrown and grafters turned out whenever the public will it at present. Public ownership of all public utilities would end this. It would bind the people hand and foot and deliver them into the hands of political grafters.—Long Branch Record.

HOW CITIES LOSE MONEY.

Municipal Plants Pay No Taxes and Reduce Tax Receipts.

The subject of lost taxes is one that deserves far more attention than it usually receives from advocates of municipal ownership. There is scarcely a municipal plant in this country which mentions this item in its reports, although it is just as much an element in cost of production as coal and wages. The omission is readily overlooked, because it is a negative expense involving no direct payment, but only a loss of income to the city.

If you own a store for which you are receiving a good rental and dispossess your tenant in order to occupy it yourself the rental value of the store becomes a charge against your business, just as it was previously a charge against your tenant's business, and you are out of pocket unless your profits exceed the rent you formerly received. Similarly if a city buys out or otherwise dispossesses a public service corporation the real, personal and franchise taxes formerly paid by the corporation become a charge against the operation of the municipal plant that succeeds the corporation, and the city is out of pocket unless the profits of its plant exceed the taxes lost.

M. O. In Chicago as Dead as Caesar.

One of the most remarkable reversals of public opinion on record is that which has taken place in Chicago in the past year in the matter of municipal ownership and operation. The municipal ownership theory, which a little more than a year ago flourished here with so much vigor as to attract the attention of the entire civilized world, is now the deadest duck in the pond. Apparently nobody believes in it any longer. Certainly nobody ever talks any more about it.—Chicago Journal.

When Officials Are Efficient.

When the administration of the departments now in charge of our local public officials show better results in economy and efficiency, it will be time, and not until then, to consider an enlargement of their responsibilities.—Everett W. Burdett.

Philippine Roads.

Reports from the Philippines inform us that the conversion of impassable trails into good highways is proceeding rapidly, and the work is being done by native convicts in charge of white officers, says Motor News. The lack of ordinarily decent roads has been one of the most serious drawbacks to development of our island possessions in that it was impossible to transport products from the interior at anywhere near a figure which left a fair profit to those who handled the stuff at the coast. Present information leads us to believe that the farsighted policy now being followed is to be continued, with the result, perhaps, that the Philippines will possess a network of splendid highways long before such results are reached in the United States.

"THE IDIOT" ON M. O.

A Suppressed Chapter of "Coffee and Repartee" by J. K. Bangs.

Glorious Times Coming, When Each Passenger Will Be Paid For Riding on the Street Cars—Morris Chairs, Desks and Carnegie Libraries to Be Provided—The City to Pay the Bill.

"I see," said the idiot as he folded up the morning paper and sat on it so that his fellow boarders might not come into possession, "that the municipal marshmallow and peanut brittle plant at Hohokus has been sold to the candy trust, and the dream of comparatively free and absolutely pure marshmallows and peanut brittle under the control of the city fathers has turned out to be a mere bit of bankrupted iridescence."

"It's all iridescence—the whole municipal ownership scheme," said Mr. Brief, the lawyer. "It's a bubble without even the soap."

"Oh, I don't think that," said the idiot. "Seems to me it's a pretty good scheme, only they ought to make it comprehensive. What I want to see is the day when the municipality owns everything that now fills the individual with care, from the toothache and appendicitis up to the trolleys, theaters and theosophy. Did you ever think, Dr. Squills, of what a fine thing it would be to operate on the body politic for a case of municipal appendicitis?"

"I have never let my mind dwell upon so fertile a field for thought—no," said the doctor. "It would be rather difficult, wouldn't it?"

"I suppose it would," returned the idiot. "I suppose it would be next to impossible to etherize the whole city government before you began to grapple around in its insides after the offending vermiform, but if it could be done wouldn't it be fine? Just think of getting rid of all the useless and inflamed members of the body politic as easily as man now sheds his personally conducted trouble with his innards."

"Do you really believe that government could run the trolleys as well as they are run by individuals?" asked Mr. Brief.

"If they couldn't they'd better go out of business," said the idiot. "I don't see why they can't run street railways as well as they run the street manicuring department. And think how nice it would be—how much envy, hatred and malice would disappear—if the people owned the trolley! For instance, when you and I see Mr. J. Willieboy Duckington hiking up the pike in his automotrouble"—

"His what?" demanded the lawyer.

"His automotrouble," said the idiot. "It's a machine run by gasoline that breeds trouble of its own power. When we see old Willieboy scooting along in his car you and I turn pale pink with envy because we haven't anything of the kind to keep us awake nights and before the police courts of all the counties 'twixt Cattaraugus and Kennebunk. We're too poor to pay even for that long and tolerably consistent scent that lies in the trail of it, and we gnash our teeth to think that we never can get our pictures in the Sunday papers because we shall never own one of those machines. But if we as citizens of this metropolis owned the trolleys it would be different. When the Green avenue and Gompers square car goes by we would look at its brilliantly lit electric interior and smile with satisfaction. 'That is my new Wilmington,' we'd say to our country cousins who were visiting us. Then we'd nod politely to the chauffeur, and he'd stop and take us aboard, and by and by the conductor would come through and hand us all a nickel"—

"What in thunder are you talking about? What on earth would the conductor hand you a nickel for?" demanded the lawyer.

"For riding on the car, of course," said the idiot. "That's the scheme, isn't it?"

"Oh, is it?" laughed the lawyer. "Well, I guess that's the way some people look at it. [illegible] precise idea of municipal [illegible] how?"

"Why," said the [illegible] and the [illegible] people as [illegible] pages of the [illegible] New York [illegible] Chicago [illegible] nicipal [illegible] of everything [illegible] register and [illegible] sending the [illegible] life and [illegible] benefit of the [illegible] the trolleys [illegible] derived [illegible] now in operation of carrying a passenger ninety miles for a nickel are to be turned back to hoi polloi in the shape of annual dividends with blue trading stamps with every dollar's worth, which on presentation at the office of any gas company in the United States will entitle the bearer to free gas for the rest of his natural life.

"The expected improvements in the public service will lie along the betterment of cars, an increased urbanity on the part of the motormen and conductors and a far greater regard for beauty in all rapid transit matters. As I understand the situation as to the first improvements, the cars are to be larger to begin with, better ventilated and without straps. No car will be so small that anybody will ever have to stand in or out of rush hours. Each passenger will be provided with a Morris chair on a swivel, with a writing desk and an electric light attached, stationery and typewriters to be had on application to the conductor. At one end of each car there will be a Carnegie library and a reading room, with all the magazines and weeklies on file, and at the other a buffet where soft drinks will be dispensed by the best mixers the politicians can drum up. In the advertising panels that run around the walls of the car, instead of these being merely friezes of patent medicines, face powders, breakfast foods and corsets, elevating literature will be printed by such authors as Dicky Davis, Ella Wheeler Wilcox and Henry James, with a college graduate on the rear platform to explain the paragraphs of the last named author to those who do not understand reformed rhetoric. Ladies will be escorted to their seats by bellboys, and every car will have a chaperon, aided by a competent bouncer to see that attractive looking shoppers, dainty little widows and others of the female persuasion are able to travel a block without being ogled on the car by vagrom drummers and lads from the smoke regions lately come into possession of their fathers' hard earned savings.

"All the motormen will be put through a course of instruction in good manners, so that when a lady on a street corner holds up her finger as a sign that she would like to get aboard, instead of cutting her dead, as many of them do at present, and going ahead as though the company didn't want any passengers, they will stop the car, lift their hats like a pack of Chesterfields, gather up her bundles, call her attention to the weather, express the hope that her family are all enjoying good health and see to it that she gets inside the car without falling on her face or sitting unexpectedly down in the lap of an entire stranger. The conductors will be similarly trained, only they will be rather better educated than the man on the front platform. I can think of no better way to show what the conductors will be than to say that they will resemble the modern policeman, that fine flower of the municipal ownership of the constabulary.

"You know what happens if you ask a policeman anything. He at once touches his helmet in respectful salutation, flicks the dust from the breast of his blue coat and places himself entirely at your service. Anything you want to know he tells you with a pleasant smile or with an expression of deep and poignant regret informs you that he is not at the moment in possession of the information you seek, but will find out at the earliest possible opportunity and send word by special delivery post if you will kindly give him your address. All of you who have had that experience with a policeman will know what to expect from the municipal ownership conductor. The city fathers as represented by their commissioner of trolleys will take the same care in the selection of the men that they now take through the police commissioner in the selection of the preservers of the peace, so that we may rest easy as to the superior morale of the force.

"Then, as for the roadbed, which is nowadays something of an eyesore in certain localities, the trolley commissioners will seek the co-operation of the commissioner of parks. Beautiful hedges of Japanese japonica will conceal the tracks from public gaze. At each street corner will be flower beds, in which the number of the street is set forth in growing plants. Trailing arbutus and Virginia creeper or wistaria vines will cover the trolley poles, and in time, when these have had a chance to grow, the whole trolley line will look like a beautiful floral and green arbor, and people living along the line, instead of looking out upon an ugly highway of steel and iron and wire, will gaze upon what appears to be a stretch of Eden running through their midst. Now, what could be better?"

"It seems perfectly lovely," said Mrs. Pedagog, the idiot's landlady, enthusiastically.

"Who's going to pay for all this?" asked Mr. Brief. "You people don't seem to take the cost of these things into consideration."

"Who pays for the parks, the police, the fire department?" asked the idiot. "It will all come out of the pockets of the city, of course. All the city has to do is to establish a municipal printing establishment and publish a few bonds whenever the sinking fund gets below the water line. Say they need a hundred million to start with. That means only a hundred thousand bonds of a par value of $1,000. Or they might get 'em out in smaller denominations of $100 each, so that the people could buy them and thus put a lot of us in possession of a certificate of ownership. They'd look awfully pretty framed and hung on the wall. The best way to do, however, would be to send them over to England and sell 'em there, for it is an established fact that there is always some city in England somewhere that will buy anything."

"That remains to be proved," said Mr. Brief.

"Well, all I have to say is that if you'll pay my expenses to London and back, guarantee me immunity from prosecution and provide me with the certificates I'll have Boston Common incorporated at $1,000,000 tomorrow and sell the whole issue at 43 before the first day of next April," said the idiot. "I'll make the late G. Whittaker Wright look like 30 cents."

"It may be, but they'd prosecute you just the same. They landed Wright and they landed Hooley for very much the same sort of thing. And after awhile they'd do the same with the city if it put its privately printed bonds for municipal ownership of the trolley on the market," persisted Mr. Brief. "Can't you see that?"

"Yes," said the idiot. "But that's the biggest point for the municipality in the whole business. You can't send a whole city to jail, you know."

LOSS $510,000 A WEEK.

Cost of Municipal Ownership to English Wage Earners.

During the years 1861-65 the rate of wages paid in Great Britain declined to such an extent that at the end of that period the workers were getting $510,000 less a week than in 1900. The total loss in wages for the five years compared with the wage scale of 1900 was more than $100,000,000. The parliamentary report from which these figures are taken records a reaction during the first half of last year, but the increase is but a bagatelle compared with the enormous loss recorded above.

As England is the country where government and municipal ownership is most general, these figures show that public ownership does not raise wages in general, but raises the wages of the few at the expense of the many.

This tremendous reduction in wages is due largely to increased taxation caused by the losses of the government and municipal industries, for higher taxes mean higher rents and a general increase in the cost of production, which must be offset in some way if England is to maintain her trade in the face of the world's competition. The easiest way to economize is to cut wages, and so the wage earner has had to pay for municipal experiments both in lower wages and higher rents.

When the wage earner is asked to vote for municipal ownership he should bear in mind that at the same time he would vote for all that goes with it—higher living expenses and lower wages, perhaps no wages at all. Who benefits? The politician who gets a new popular issue, the politician's close friends who are put on municipal jobs and the large consumer who gets his service for less than cost. Where does the wage earner come in? He pays the bills.

Philadelphia's Waterworks.

The Philadelphia Public Ledger predicts a general shakeup in the water department as the result of a recent inspection of the pumping stations. It states that evidence of neglect and inefficiency was found on every hand. This is not surprising in view of the fact that some of the "engineers" in charge of pumping stations were originally appointed as coal heavers and owe to political influence their promotion to their present responsible positions. The officials admit that the condition is serious, as much of the machinery is so worn as to be incapable of performing anything like its full duty. It is also admitted that much of the material received for repairs, etc., is defective and not in accordance with specifications. This condition has been known to members of the council for years.

Unfair Distribution of Cost.

A special dispatch from Kirkwood, Mo., to the Chicago Tribune states that the municipal electric light plant of that city has proved a failure. The generating plant will be shut down, and electricity will be purchased from a private company at one-third of what it has cost the city to make it. The city will sell to its customers at a price high enough to enable it to light the streets without cost to the taxpayers. This is typical of municipal ownership inequity—to force the users of electricity to pay for all the street lighting, although they are not benefited any more than the citizens who use gas or oil.

Failure of Municipal Bakeries.

The failure of the municipal bakeries at Catania, Italy, is reported by Mr. Churchill, the British consul at Palermo. There was a $30,000 deficit in the balance sheet, and the request governing a loan of $80,000 was refused by a royal commission. In consequence the institution has been closed.—United States Consular Reports.

In the Highways and Byways

By PETER MARTIN

Copyright, 1903, by [illegible]

TO George Morgan the return of Christmas brought no pleasure. Indeed, the advent of the season of joy had plunged him into the depths of the blues. When busy with his work he found solace for his loneliness in the success of his pursuit of money, but when even for a time was resting he was forced to realize it, and that made him a prey to his thoughts.

As a fruit broker and manager of a cold storage plant he had amassed a considerable fortune. He knew his business from the bottom up, having begun life selling bananas from a basket in the streets of the city. Inch by inch he progressed with that steady thrift peculiar to a certain strain of Americans, and his thrift was vitalized by a spirit of enterprise. Each little business triumph had enabled him to plan a greater until he finally found himself at the head of the business. Though he met many men he was not one to accumulate friends, and, as for women, they had no part in his life.

"DID SANTA CLAUS COME TO SEE YOU LAST NIGHT?"

And yet this is hardly true. One woman there was whose memory was cherished in the secret recesses of his heart. A chance acquaintanceship had developed on his part to love, but, being unused to the graces of social intercourse and having the reputation of being a hard and grasping man, he had made but little progress. With the precipitation of a business man he had proposed marriage before she had even learned to regard him as a friend and when he was refused had returned to his work with a desperate energy that made the thousands grow beneath his hand.

But on Christmas eve his success had little value. Not even his books, for he had educated himself, could yield him solace, and the sound of merrymaking in the streets but added to his dejection.

But he could reproach no one. If others had no thought for him, for whom did he have a thought? At this question the quiet face of Ethel Dangerfield rose for a moment in his memory, but the vision was quickly brushed aside. In his gloomy introspection he plunged further back in his life, to the time when he was a lonely boy in the cold and heartless city and there was no Christmas for him. He could not remember his mother as living or his father as sober. If any one had been kind to him, then life might have been different. Suddenly he was stung by a thought, and, springing from the sofa where he was lying, he walked several times excitedly from end to end of his bachelor apartment.

"I'll do it," he finally exclaimed. "By thunder, I'll do it!"

Taking up his overcoat, he began to put it on when his eyes suddenly fell on the clock, and he stopped, with a laugh. It was already after 1 o'clock on Christmas morning, and, of course, he could not carry out his purpose. Throwing aside his coat, he resumed his walking, but with a happier expression on his countenance and a lighter feeling at his heart than he had known for many a day. At length he repaired to his little bedroom for the night, where he slept with an easy conscience.

On the following morning, when the children of all the world were rejoicing with their toys and reveling in the good cheer of Christmas, George Morgan, the wealthy fruit broker, came downtown from his apartments and picked his way carefully into one of the worst slums. There were dirty and ragged children everywhere in the streets, but all of them had something to gladden their hearts. It might be only a little rag doll or a penny's worth of candy, but still it was something.

This man knew the city too well, however, to be deceived by appearances. His boyhood had been spent in just such a street, and he knew that somewhere such a boy as he was in quest of could be found. With an alert eye he glanced down alleyways and among the garbage barrels until finally in the doorway of a tumbledown house he found the boy he was seeking.

A pathetic little figure with tearful eyes was huddling out of the reach of the biting wind. With the skill of a diplomatist Morgan proceeded with his mission. He stopped in front of the doorway and looked up and down the street several times as if searching for something. He then gave utterance to an exclamation of annoyance, which caused the little boy to look up at him inquiringly.

"Can you tell me where William Jones' clothing store is?"

Instantly the boy brightened. Here was an opportunity to earn a nickel, and he was at the side of his possible benefactor in an instant.

"It's just down de street. I kin show you where it is."

"I wish you would, my little man," and he started to walk in the direction indicated, with the little boy at his side. After a carefully timed pause, which gave his guide an opportunity to look him over with the keen sagacity of a street urchin, he asked:

"Did Santa Claus come to see you last night?"

"Naw," retorted the little arab, with an expression of defiance that only thinly veiled his disappointment.

"But you are going to have a Christmas dinner, are you not?"

"Oh, yes," replied the little man cheerfully. "Mrs. Dugan asked me to wait up for her. She does cleaning and dishwashing in one of the big houses uptown, and they always gives her something dat's left over at dinner. She's asked me to come and have a bite wid her and wid Maggie and Jack when she gits home."

"But haven't you any folks of your own?"

"Yes; I've got dad, but he's too drunk to care for what as happens to me, and I don't spect he'll git over it for two or three days."

The case was so like that of his own youth that Morgan felt a lump rising in his throat. A child always knows when he is being sympathized with truly, and the little street arab was as comfortable with his new friend as if he had known him all his life.

"Here's Jones' place," said the boy, "but it's closed today."

"Yes, but Jones lives upstairs, doesn't he?" said Morgan, who really knew the district well.

"Sure he does."

"Then we'll ring him up," and Morgan applied himself to the bell. In the meantime the little boy was wondering why his expected nickel hadn't appeared, but refrained from asking for it to the last moment.

Presently Jones opened the door, looking greasy and unkempt.

"Well, Mr. Jones," said Morgan, "here's a little boy who wants a new suit of clothes. Don't you think you could open up and sell it to him?"

"W-wha-what?" exclaimed the ragamuffin.

"You see," explained Morgan, "you are going to have your Christmas dinner with me at a restaurant, and I think you would feel better if you dressed up before you went. What do you think?"

What the little fellow thought was not of the things that could be told in words, and Jones, seeing a prospect of a sale, opened his shop without urging. Picking from the goods displayed a complete outfit of warm clothing, Morgan asked if they could not get a basin of water and a towel in a back room so that their little friend could dress up. After some difficulty these necessaries and a dry, well seasoned piece of soap were produced. For the first time within his memory Bud Lester, for he had by this time confessed his name, approached water with enthusiasm, and it was not many minutes until he stood before his benefactor thoroughly transformed. For the first time in his life he had new shoes and new clothes from his socks to his cap. Having paid

"DO YOU MIND IF I RING YOU UP AGAIN?"

the tailor, Morgan took his little friend by the hand and started toward the street, but he suddenly paused.

"By the way, Jones," he explained, "I may want to do a little more buying here this forenoon. Do you mind if I ring you up again?"

"Certainly not, sir; certainly not," said Jones, willing to do anything to oblige so excellent a customer.

"Now, Bud, tell me about Maggie and Jack. Where are they going to have their Christmas dinner?"

"They're going to have it with their mother when she gits home."

"At noon?"

"Oh, I guess they're just going to wait the same as I was going to do."

"Where are they now?"

"They're in der mother's room, and Mrs. Munsey, across the hall, is keeping an eye on them."

"Do you think we could get them to come with us for dinner?"

"Do I think it? Gee, sure they'd come!"

"Well, let us go and get them."

Presently Morgan was climbing the dark stairway to the top floor of the vile smelling, dimly lighted tenement, with Bud preceding him two steps at a time.

"Hey, Mag and Jack, what d'yer think? Here's a gentleman as wants us to have dinner wid him. And look at the noo clothes he's got for me!"

Glancing about the room, Morgan saw that it was clean, though poverty stricken, and the children were well washed, though their clothes showed evidence of much mending. They did not require so thorough an overhauling as their friend Bud, but still they needed much to make their Christmas day what it should be. Morgan found little difficulty in winning their confidence, having so eloquent an advocate as Bud, and as Mrs. Munsey looked in he explained his purpose.

"Sure, I intended taking them over myself at noon, but it's poor we are, and with many mouths to feed; and I am sure their mother will be thankful to you for giving them a treat."

Having made these arrangements, Morgan returned with his little crowd to Jones' and re-enforced their clothing with a warm coat for Jack and a cape for Maggie. He then took them to a quiet little restaurant that he knew. To their imaginations it was a wonderful place, and he was too wise in the ways of the poor to take them to any place where their surroundings might make them uncomfortable or where they would attract the notice of the other guests. The little restaurant was in the rear of a delicatessen store and was patronized only by the poorer classes. The food, however, was plentiful and wholesome, and, entering fully into the spirit of the occasion, Morgan placed his guests at a table and discussed with them with much seriousness every item on the bill of fare. By tactful questions he learned of the luxuries they most longed for and saw to it that they lacked for nothing. Little by little he learned from them their stories and became so absorbed that he did not notice a quietly dressed lady who had entered to make some purchases and while waiting to be served had noticed the happy group in the restaurant. She could hardly believe her eyes, but when she had assured herself that she was not dreaming her eyelashes became wet with tears. Moving quietly over to the group, she laid her hand on Morgan's arm. He looked up quickly, then stood up awkwardly, like a boy caught in mischief.

SHE LAID HER HAND ON MORGAN'S ARM.

"Miss Dangerfield," he stammered, "I hardly expected to see you here."

"Nor I you," she replied. "But there are some poor people here in this neighborhood that I am interested in, and I just ran down to see if they had everything pleasant for their Christmas. I found that they were in need, and I came here to buy something for them. But you?"

"The fact is," he stammered, "I was feeling lonely and did not have anywhere to go for Christmas dinner, so I just thought I'd do something foolish and hunted up these waifs and strays, and—well, we are here and having a glorious time."

"I can see that you are," she said gently to this strong, successful man whom she saw in a light hitherto undreamed of.

"But," she added, "I cannot think of you not having any place to go for Christmas dinner. Father and mother and I are alone today, and I am going to set another plate for you. We dine at half past 7."

"But," he began.

"I'll take no 'buts,'" she interrupted authoritatively, and she was a girl accustomed to having her own way. "I will not listen to any refusal. You must come." Then she added pleadingly, "You will come, won't you?"

Before he knew what he was doing he had stammered his thanks and accepted her invitation. When she had left the store his gayety seemed greatly increased, and for the little waifs the dinner turned out even more gloriously than it had promised. To them it was indeed a Christmas such as they had not before dared to dream of.

But it was not their last Christmas in high life. The following year they were invited to have their Christmas dinner in the cozy little flat uptown with a certain Mr. and Mrs. Morgan, with whom they appeared to be on wonderfully good terms.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 17, 1907.

HON. MILTON G. URNER, of Frederick, ex-Representative in Congress from this District, is being urged by his friends of Frederick county and other parts of the State, to become a candidate for the nomination of Governor on the Republican ticket. Mr. Urner served his constituency while in Congress faithfully and zealously and will do so again if he become Governor of the Commonwealth.

AFTER GOVERNOR WARFIELD.

There are many signs that the old Democratic organization is determined to oppose Governor Warfield for another term and this means that the Governor must either make an aggressive fight for the honor or must step down and out. The Governor has not displayed much aggressiveness as a fighter and this is the more remarkable when it is remembered that he has often exhibited the nerve to go against his own party on important issues, as for example the Poe Amendment. His indisposition to engage in a contest with the organization is attributed by some people to cowardice, while to others he gets the credit of sizing up the situation and recognizing that he could not successfully cope with it in a fight. To still others the Governor's lack of boldness and his failure to take advantage of his popularity among many classes for his many sterling qualities, is inexplicable. New interest was added this week by a speech made in Baltimore before the Concord Club by State Senator Gorman, son of the late U. S. Senator. The Senator from Howard county is an open and aggressive fighter and he left no one in doubt as to his opposition to Governor Warfield. He even went so far as to say that Governor Warfield presented "the sad spectacle of a man, elected as a Democrat, who failed to do what he was elected to do." The Governor was pictured as "straying away from the sound and safe principles" of the patron saint of regular Democracy—Andrew Jackson. Mr. Gorman's speech has been followed by the semi-official announcement that our own distinguished fellow citizen, the Hon. Murray Vandiver, has concluded that the mantle of the Governorship is just about his size and that he would be willing to accept the nomination. The nomination of Mr. Vandiver, if the Governor is to be thrown down, seems to be most fitting. It would bring on a clean-cut fight between the advocates of progressive government and the old Gorman regime that would be most welcome just at the time when new conditions are to be met owing to the death of Mr. Gorman and other old time influential leaders.

THE REPUBLICAN acknowledges the receipt of an invitation from the publishers of the Baltimore Sun to be present in Baltimore on the 17th inst., at the formal opened of the Sun's new home when the building will be opened for the inspection of the public.

Several Railroads Wrecks.

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is having considerable trouble at this time on its line passing through this county. Monday night two smash-ups was the record and Tuesday night a third was added. The wrecks Monday night occurred one at Deer Park, when three coal cars were derailed and delayed traffic some time and other took place at Rinard when several freight cars were broken up. Tuesday night the east-bound way train ran into a freight on the grade above Bloomington, which reduced the caboose of the freight along with five freights cars into kindling wood and scattered merchandise along the roadbed for a considerable distance. Trains were delayed for an hour or more. None of the trainmen were hurt in any case.

Both Lost Fingers.

Gilroy Whorton, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Whorton, lost the end of one of his fingers Saturday in a cutting box which he was operating in his father's stable.

Patrick Kildow, son of Mr. and Mrs. William Kildow, met a like misfortune while cutting kindling wood Monday evening.

VERY HELPFUL TO WARFIELD

Attack of Arthur Pue Gorman, Jr., Has An Unexpected Effect.

BALTIMORE, Md., Jan. 15.—The speech delivered by Senator Arthur P. Gorman, Jr., at the Jackson day banquet of the Concord Club, in which he roundly denounced Gov. Warfield and scored the independents and the independent press, has been the one topic of conversation not only among politicians of both parties but in social clubs and business circles as well. That it was an open declaration of war upon the governor by young Gorman there is no question.

Was Gorman the mouthpiece of the old machine which his father reared and did he voice the sentiments of all the organization leaders? That is the question being asked on all sides today. If he did, then not one of the old war horses has had the courage to indorse his remarks in public. It has been unable to secure an expression of opinion indorsing young Gorman's speech from any of the big men who made up the old guard.

One of the former lieutenants of the Gorman machine, who declined to have his name used, said "Young Gorman's speech was ill-advised—it was a bad break. He has made Gov. Warfield an issue in the coming campaign and it will be much harder to side-track Warfield now than it would have been had Gorman not assailed him. The effect of that speech, to my mind, can only solidify the independents behind Warfield. I had good reason to believe that the governor had about made up his mind to retire at the end of his term; in fact, I know that he did not have the slightest intention of making a fight for the nomination.

"Now, however, it seems to me that his friends and followers will insist upon making a fight for a renomination. The governor has made a great record—that must be admitted—and is in a position to make a strong fight for a renomination. I am not blind to the fact that political machines are very unpopular in Maryland today, and the only results from Gorman's speech have been to injure the organization and further strengthen the governor with the masses of independents that hold the balance of power."

The followers of Gov. Warfield are jubilant over the turn of events. They claim that Gorman's declaration of war is in effect an appeal for a return to old machine methods in Democratic politics and that the governor owes it as a duty to his followers and the independents to lead the fight against a return to old conditions. They point to the fact that the governor had publicly announced that he would not seek a renomination, but that if there was a general demand for him to again be the standard bearer he would accept, although at a great personal sacrifice. It is for this reason that Gorman's speech has aroused great resentment among the governor's friends, who will insist that Mr. Warfield in the near future shall formally announce his candidacy for a second term.

They claim that Gorman's speech was the greatest endorsement of the governor's administration that could have been secured and they further claim that young Gorman would not have made such an attack on the governor without first consulting the big leaders of the old machine. Therefore they claim, Warfield must accept the guage of battle as laid down and become the leader of the new Democracy in Maryland.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44-5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

Calendars Received.

This office acknowledges the receipt from Mr. Charles A. Bender, proprietor of the National Hotel at Grantsville, a highly ornamented calendar in the form of a rose ladened automobile upon which is printed a picture of Mr. Bender's well known hostelry along the Pike.

Every Two Minutes

Physicians tell us that all the blood in a healthy human body passes through the heart once in every two minutes. If this action becomes irregular the whole body suffers. Poor health follows poor blood; Scott's Emulsion makes the blood pure. One reason why is such a great aid is because it passes so quickly into the blood. It is partly digested before it enters the stomach; a double advantage in this. Less work for the stomach; quicker and more direct benefits. To get the greatest amount of good with the least possible effort is the desire of everyone in poor health. Scott's Emulsion does just that. A change for the better takes place even before you expect it.

We will send you a sample free.

Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is:

AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

LOCAL AND OTHERWISE.

Incidents and Events at Home and Abroad—Personal Mention, Etc.

The skating rink recently opened in Oakland is being well patronized.

Mr. George Loar, of Grafton, spent Sunday in Oakland with his mother.

Merchant Charles S. Davis went to Baltimore Tuesday night on a business mission.

Mr. Howard W. Hoffman, of Keyser, was in Oakland Monday en route to Grafton.

Military Lot Titles traced and certified for $1 each, in advance. Hiram P. Tasker, Cumberland, Md. 44-tf.

Mrs. Joseph Adair and daughter Miss Bessie, of Terra Alta, are in Oakland the guest of Mr. and Mrs. King Delawder.

Mr. John Snyder, one of our Deer Park subscribers, was in Oakland Friday last and made this office a pleasant visit.

Mr. Thomas Little, who is holding a position with Mr. W. A. Harvey at Gormania, was in Oakland Friday afternoon for a few hours.

We are pleased to note that Mr. Thomas Martin, Jr., who has heen very ill for several weeks with an attack of pneumonia, is convalescing.

Ex-County Treasurer E. A. Weimer sold at public auction on last Friday a number of pieces of real estate to satisfy the taxes due upon the same.

Dr. E. H. Bartlett, who visited his daughter for ten days at her home near St. Louis, Mo., returned to his home in Oakland last Saturday morning.

The new dwelling being erected by Mr. Franklin O. Glotfelty on Second street extended, is nearing completion and will be occupied shortly by the owner and family.

Mr. Charles Liller, who recently had a new residence erected on his property on Second street, has moved into it with his family. The house is of pretty design, commodious and nicely finished.

Mr. Theo. George, of Swanton, was in Oakland on business Saturday. Mr. George is a son of Mr. A. F. George, of near Swanton, and is employed at present by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad company.

Rev. Dr. W. W. Davis, Superintendent of Mountain Lake Park, who has been in Baltimore and Washington for two weeks or more, was in Oakland for a brief visit Friday of last week, returning east the same afternoon.

Mr. Jacob S. Miller, one of Grantsville's best citizens, was in the city Tuesday of this week, coming to Oakland via the National Road and Frostburg. The former he reports in bad condition, passable, though extremely rough and hard to travel.

Mr. P. E. Kimmell, of the Eclipse Printery, was taken to the City Hospital on the West Side this (Thursday) morning, to undergo treatment for typhoid fever, which his sickness of several days previous unfortunately culminated in.—Grafton Leader.

Special services in St. Paul's M. E. church were begun on last Sanday evening by Rev. J. B. Workman the pastor, which have been continued every evening since and will be held for an indefinite time. Good sized congregations greet the minister at each service, and some interest is being manifested.

Peter Yost, one of the prosperous farmers of Garrett county, Md., who resides near Grantsville, was in town on Tuesday, and was a most welcome visitor at this office. Mr. Yost is a breeder of good horses, and is a great lover of that animal, and we enjoyed a very pleasant chat with him along that line.—Meyersdale Republican.

Messrs. Kerens Brothers have shipped their saw mill to a point south of Elkins on the Coal and Iron Railroad where they will engage in the manufacture of lumber for a company recently formed in Oakland composed of the Messrs. Kerens, Owen Treacy and Joseph Kisner. The tract comprises four hundred acres and is well timbered with spruce and hardwoods.

A dairyman, who furnishes milk to customers in Grafton, has demanded money in court from the city for watering his milk. The watering was done when his milk wagon went down in a deep pool of muddy water in a street on the South Side of that city the other morning. This is a rather new and novel situation. Usually milkmen pay the city for the means of watering their milk.—Clarksburg Telegram.

The superintendent of the National pike was at Somerfield last week making an inspection of the road through this neighborhood. He found the old national highway in the worst condition that it has been for years; in fact some parts of it are almost impassable. The worst part of the road is that extending west from Somerfield and the superintendent has decided to repair five miles of this road at a cost of sixty thousand dollars.—Uniontown Standard.

Make up your mind that whatever you may have done in the past you will in the future wear your clouds "inside out, and show the lining." We all have clouds, but that is no reason why we should draw the attention of the world to them. It is the brave, cheerful soldiers who inspire the others. So if you can't get what you like, determine to like what you have or at all events to make the best of it and go on your way bravely, without complaining.

Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Bolden have the sympathy of our people, for they have been having typhoid fever in their home for the past three months and last week Mrs. Bolden and one of the little girls were taken down with that disease, but we are pleased to state that they are getting along very well, and are having the disease in a mild form. Her sister and a neice of Mr. Bolden's arrived here from Oakland on last Thursday to help care for the afflicted ones.—Meyersdale Republican.

Ex-Sheriff Charles Wegman, formerly of Grantsville, but for several years past a resident of Frostburg, a village along the old Pike which boasts of a "paper that is exclusively great" and the headquarters of numerous "Cumberland" coal works, was in Oakland all day Tuesday seeing many of his old friends and attending to some business matters requiring his attention. Mr. Wegman is engaged in the carpenter business at Frostburg and reports business extremely good.

The young man who thinks he is poor because he has no bank account little understands the value of God's free gift of health and strength, little appreciates the fact that the brightest and best of the country are self-made, and come to the notice of the world from just such beginnings. Not by idly moaning that they are poor, but by going carefully to work, perfecting themselves in their chosen pursuits and becoming so useful to these about them that their services are always in demand, whether it be on the platform, in the shop or in the kitchen, for all are honorable alike.

The Rev. Dr. Manges, pastor of the Oakland, Md., Lutheran church, was an unexpected guest part of last Sunday of the Rev. and Mrs. A. F. Richardson, at the Lutheran parsonage of this city. Rev. Manges had gone east from Oakland last week to attend a marriage, and was returning to Oakland Saturday evening when his train was blocked out by a big landslide on the grade above Piedmont. His train was sent around by way of Elkins and the Reverend gentleman was left at this point about eight o'clock Sunday morning. He remained over until the afternoon and assisted Rev. Richardson in the communion service which were celebrated in the church that day.—Grafton Sentinel.

FOR SALE—Pair young bay horses; weight 2600 pounds; good workers and sound. Apply to C. A. Ashby, Crellin, Md. 4t-paid.

The purpose of store advertising is not merely to sell goods, but to sell more goods—to make friends, build up a patronage that will not only stick but grow. Newspapers reach the greatest number of people in the immediate vicinity in the most natural way, at the least expense, and they are therefore the best of all mediums for stores. In a newspaper office you follow the lines of the least resistance—you follow with the stream—you talk to an audieuce already assembled, to the people who want to read—their mental cosmos is right—they are on your wire, and they won't ring off if you hold their interest. Attraction is the basis of all advertising—the store is the sun, the customers the planets that revolves around it.

The Cumberland News thus summerizes the conclusions to be drawn from the testimony before the coronor's jury investigating the causes of the late railroad disaster at Terra Cotta, Md. "A fast train run behind a slow local with a fast watch in the engineer's pocket! A block system that stretched and shortened intermittently to permit a trifling economy! Signal lanterns so feeble as to be invisible through forty yards of fog. Truly, the disclosures before the coronor's jury are indicating that the responsibility for the Terra Cotta wreck is administrative as well as individual. And what is true in this case is probably true in many others. Usually the public has been satisfied—or forced to be satisfied—with the sterotyped finding 'engineer at fault' or 'signalman to blame,' but fortunately the probe is being pushed now to the bottom of the matter and the result is a series of revelations which indicates that there is looseness of system and inefficiency in the safeguards."

Country life has its drawbacks but it has its great advantages which overcome them. True, those who live in the country are "Rubes" and "Farmers" and "hayseeds" to the cigarette smokers in town, but the boast of the business men in the world today is that they were born on a farm. Take away the surrounding evils that beset the young men or women on the threshold of life's journey in the city, and substitute the helpful influence of nature, and you fortify them for the sterner walks in life. The few things which they do not know about table etiquette and when it is proper to leave two visiting cards and when but one, they will catch onto much quicker than city boys and girls will learn to properly stoke the furnace or make good bread. No boy or girl need be ashamed of living on the farm, for if they have taken advant age of what it has offered they are well fortified for after life.

Judge Kendall Goes West.

Judge U. S. Kendall, whose term of office as judge of the intermediate court ended yesterday, is preparing to leave within the next few weeks for Washington state where he will locate. He has been appointed counsel for the Kendall Lumber company at that place. Judge Kendall had been a resident of Fairmont for the past ten years and his many friends have learned with regret that he is to go so far away.—Fairmont West Virginian.

Motion for a New Trial to Be Argued.

Associate Judge Robert R. Henderson has notified the attorneys interested in the matter that he will be in Oakland on Monday, the 28th inst., when he will hear argument on the motion made at the December Term of the Circuit Court for a new trial of the case of the State vs. Charles Platt, convicted of having burned the McMillan saw mill located over in Election District No. 8.

Blackburn Case Appealed.

The suit of Mrs. Mary E. Blackburn, of Kitzmillervilie, who recovered damages amounting to $1000 against the Board of County Commissioners for injuries sustained by her by falling over the approach to the Potomac River bridge at the above point, has been appealed by the Board of Cemmissioners to the Court of Appeals and will be argued at the present term of the court. Mr. Julius C. Renninger represents the Commissioners and Mr. Gilmor S. Hamill is Mrs. Blackburn's attorney.

INSTITUTE AT FRIENDSVILLE.

A Two Days' Session Will be Held Jan. 25 and 26.

Under the auspices of the Garrett County Teachers' Association, a two days' institute will be held at Friendsville on Friday and Saturday, January 25 and 26. It is proposed to convene the institute on Friday morning and those teachers who attend this institute will be allowed to close their schools Friday without the loss of time, as it is thought by being present at a two-days' session more information and knowledge will be gained by the teacher than at a one day session, and that they will return to their school rooms better equipped for their duties.

An evening entertainment will be held Friday evening, which will consist of music, recitations, readings, etc., by the scholars of the Friendsville school.

The following is the program for the institute:

Devotion, Rev. Lister.
Address of Welcome, Rev. Salem.
Response, Mr. Geo. E. Bishoff.
Primary Numbers and Primary Reading, Mattie Riley and Olive Dewitt.
Orthography, J. C. Beahm and B. W. Frantz.
U. S. History and Geography, H. W. Browning and E. A. Browning.
English Grammer and Rhetoric, Rev. C. W. Hudson, A. W. DeWitt and S. K. Welch.
Penmanship, Earl King and Burns Lowdermilk.
Principles of Algebra, A. W. DeWitt and N. K. Welch.
School Management, H. H. Flick, R. W. Miller, Bernadette Mattingly, Anna Snyder and Lizzie Welch.

The music will be in charge of the Friendsville school.

In connection with the above the following letter is published:

To the Teachers of Garrett County.

At a local institute held at Accident recently, it was unanimously decided that one-day institutes did not give sufficient time to discuss the important subjects and arrive at safe and sound conclusions as to a county system for the operation of our schools and the best method of imparting instruction. At a meeting of the School Board January 9, it was decided to hold two day institutes at Friendsville, Grantsville and Oakland, and to pay all teachers who attend for the Friday, but not the Saturday, on which said institute shall be held. Teachers are urged to attend, and are reminded that their oath of office demands it of them. Unfortunately our county is not an exception to the misfortunes that ofttimes cripples the best interests of the school. The cause of these misfortunes can sometimes be justly laid at the door of the trustees, sometimes at that of the patrons and sometimes at that of the teacher, or perhaps at that of the higher officials. We therefore cordially invite and earnestly urge everybody to attend these institutes and interest themselves in and acquaint themselves with the law, the system and the methods by which we hope to make our schools better and the results worth the cost. The first meeting will be held at Friendsville January 25 and 26, with a special meeting on Friday evening. The institute for Oakland and Grantsville will be announced as soon as programs can be arranged.

It is earnestly hoped that all friends of education will come to our meetings—come prepared to ask and discuss questions.

These meetings will all be under the auspices of the County Teachers' Association, and the evening session in the hands of the school at which it is held.

F. E. RATHBUN,
Pres. Co. Association.
E. A. BROWNING,
County Superintendent.

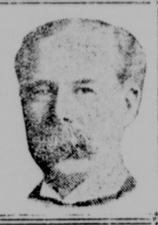
The Marvelous Prosperity of the United States



By Sir THOMAS LIPTON

A VISIT of some weeks' duration to the United States, wherein I had the opportunity of inspecting the great American manufactories and of examining in detail the progress of American industry, convinces me that the British public has no idea of the kind of prosperity the United States is enjoying today. It is no exaggeration to state that AT NO PREVIOUS PERIOD IN HUMAN HISTORY has such prosperity been known in any country.

Every one in America is making money; not only making money, but making it IN PILES—in such piles that the ordinary standards of comfort and luxury are disappearing and are being replaced by new ideals. The demand for labor is such that it cannot be supplied, whereby work in many places is very much curtailed.

THE PURCHASING POWER OF THE PEOPLE IS RUSHING UP BY LEAPS AND BOUNDS.

The railways' immense prosperity has had an effect on the steel and iron trade, but even America's gigantic iron output is so inadequate that she is driven to buy raw iron abroad. The steel trust alone makes more pig iron than the whole of the works in the United Kingdom. British industries are DWARFED in comparison with those of this prodigious American colossus.

American steel and iron makers are fully booked with orders for the next two years, a state of things which has NEVER been known in England. The cost of food in Britain is now very high, owing chiefly to the short shipments from America, and the day is not far distant when all the food products of America will be required FOR AMERICAN CONSUMPTION.

AMERICAN PROSPERITY DEPENDS UPON THE IMMENSE EXPANSION OF SOLID INDUSTRIES, UPON THE INCREASING PURCHASING POWER OF THE PEOPLE, UPON THE LEGITIMATE DEVELOPMENT OF AGRICULTURE AND THE MINING INDUSTRY. THIS PROSPERITY IS SUCH THAT IT IS PROSECUTING MAMMOTH PUBLIC WORKS FOR WHICH IN LESS FORTUNATE TIMES CAPITAL WOULD BE UNOBTAINABLE.

The Noble Qualities Of the Southern Youth

By Dr. EDWIN ALDERMAN, President of the University of Virginia

OUR real problem is to try to industrialize our society WITHOUT COMMERCIALIZING ITS SOUL. I wonder if the thing is possible.

A nation's progress is measured by the distance it has traveled, as well as by the point it has reached. There is no such tragic story of RUIN AND EXHAUSTION in the world as the story of the south from 1860 to 1880. In 1860 the south possessed 44 per cent of the wealth of the nation, or $5,500,000,000. In ten years it had lost 60 per cent of that sum, and if one may count the invalidism and death of 300,000 men and the emigration of thousands of others IT HAD LOST ALL.

The southern boy of this generation has found himself at last in American life and made himself at home at the moment when the republic was most in need of his tempered strength. He is A FINE, HOPEFUL FIGURE, this southern boy, whom I know so well, of strong, high political instincts, facing tardily a fierce industrialism and a new democracy with its grandeurs AND TEMPTATIONS, his ambitions and dreams moving about them and yet holding fast through the conservatism in his blood to the noble concepts of public probity and SCORN OF DISHONOR.

Gigantic Energy of America

By T. P. O'CONNOR, Member of Parliament

A GIGANTIC energy outside and INDEPENDENT OF MAN—that is my impression of the terrific city of New York. That is the impression I have of most of America.

When you get down to the offices in Wall street and the other business streets of New York you get the impression of deafening noise, of overwhelming and bewildering speed, and, in contrast with all this, of universal and BROODING SADNESS. You find not one but half a dozen lifts in a single building. They rush up and down at intervals of a few seconds. They have the ordinary elevator which stops at every floor, and then the express elevator, which rushes at a speed that almost makes your heart stop, up past twelve or twenty floors without a pause.

AND INSIDE THE ELEVATOR STANDS A MAN OR BOY, SELF ABSORBED, SILENT, BARELY ANSWERING A QUESTION, SUGGESTIVE OF SOME VICTIM OF OMNIPOTENT AND RESISTLESS AND GLOOMY DESTINY.

Effect of "The Family" Upon Marital Purity

By Rev. Dr. CHARLES H. PARKHURST of New York

THE last blow upon the SANCTITY OF MARRIAGE comes from a source which we would never have anticipated, and it has come in the shape of a book entitled "The Family."

I have read it conscientiously from preface to conclusion, so that I am not dependent upon the catchlines of sensational papers.

The authoress expresses a shy distrust of nuptial purity, seems reluctantly willing to suspect that the ethics of the pasture may have to suffice for the ETHICS OF THE HOME, and so sets hesitatingly ajar the door that so many are wanting to see widely opened into the unfenced fields of promiscuity and LIBERTINISM. I am not charging the book with any impurity OF INTENTION nor with any suggestion of sympathy with immorality.

IT MUST, HOWEVER, OPERATE TO GIVE MATRIMONIAL LOOSENESS OF LIFE A STANDING OF RESPECTABILITY.

The Know It All.

MOST agervatin' customer wuz Nickodemus Brown,
Who knowed it all an' bound to have his say.
There wuzn't no theayter play thet ever come to town
But Brown he'd git to see it, night or day.
He'd make a p'int to git his seat 'fore any of the rest,
An' when the curtain riz upon the play
An' all the actors got to work a-doin' of their best
He'd snicker in his agervatin' way.
An' when the most excitin' part of all wuz gittin' near
An' folks wuz sittin' nervous an' perplexed
Old Brown he'd whisper loud enough for every one to hear,
"I'll bet you I kin tell w'at's comin' next."

Thar wuzn't any curin' him. He'd be the same in church
Or anywheres he happened fur to be.
Fur, like an old poll parrot jest a-settin' on its perch,
He'd squawk to all his critics, "Talk is free."
But when the grip wuz goin' round—last winter wuz a year—
It tackled on to Nick an' took him down.
An' then he got religion, fur he thought his end wuz near,
An', sure enough, that wuz the end o' Brown.
His folks wuz all a-gathered round, an' jest before he died,
While Deacon Jones wuz readin' of a text,
The sick man smiled, an' "Well, I'm done with this here world," he sighed.
"I'll bet you I kin tell w'at's comin' next."

—T. A. Daly in Catholic Standard and Times.

Maybe She Is Not the Only One.

Banker's Daughter—The baron loves me. He proposed to me today.

Her Friend—Then he loves you. But do you know whether he loves any one else?—Jugend.

Opportune.

"What are you doing?" harshly demanded the brutal husband, abruptly entering the room.

"I'm just going to trim this forty-nine cent hat I bought yesterday," replied the trembling wife.

"Extravagant woman, you will ruin me with your everlasting bargain hunting!" he exclaimed, enraged, and, seizing the hat, he crumpled it in his hands, trampled it underfoot and, finally flinging it into the corner of the room, strode away.

Weeping, the wife stooped to pick up her insulted property, but her tear stained face was irradiated by an ecstatic rapture as her eyes fell upon it.

"Oh," she exclaimed in delight, "now it is the exact shape of that forty dollar French hat I saw yesterday, and I never could have got it that way myself! All it needs is a couple of blue roses and a bunch of lavender buttercups."—Lippincott's Magazine.

A Puzzler.

In a certain town are two brothers who are engaged in the retail coal business. A noted evangelist visited the town and converted the elder brother of the firm.

For weeks after his conversion the brother who had lately "got religion" endeavored to persuade the other to join the church. One day when the elder brother was making another effort he asked:

"Why can't you, Richard, join the church, as I did?"

"It's all right for you to be a member of the church," replied Richard, "but if I join who's going to weigh the coal?"—Cleveland Leader.

Public Office.

"Well, Moses," began the senator as a grinning southern darky was ushered into his presence at Washington, "what brings you here?"

"Mars Joe," replied Moses, "I's got 'portant business, sah. I want er office."

"You want an office? Why, what can you do?"

"Do, Mars Joe? What does everybody do that gets er office? Bless yer heart, Mars Joe, yer don't understand me, Moses. I ain't lookin' fer work, sah. I only wants er office."—Philadelphia Ledger.

A Mere Babe.

"Ah, me!" sighed young Kallow, with a lovelorn glance at the object of his affections, "I was so full of misery I tossed and turned upon my bed last night and could not sleep."

"You don't say!" remarked the heartless girl. "What's the matter with you—teething?"—Catholic Standard and Times.

Always After Him.

Sandy Pikes—Did you ever follow de horses, pard?

Gritty George—No; I always had as much as I could do to keep de horses from following me.

Sandy Pike—Race horses?

Gritty George—No, saw horses.—Chicago News.

He Tried It Once.

"What made your husband's hair turn so gray? He's still a young man. Was it the result of some terrible fright?"

"No. He once tried to have a house built."—Judge.

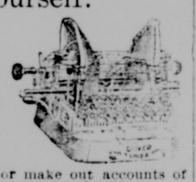
You Can Easily Operate This Typewriter Yourself.



your correspondent.
Dont write him anything by hand that takes him time to make out—that may leave him in doubt—that he can't easily read.
And don't fill out legal papers or card memos—or make out accounts of hotel menus in your own handwriting.
It looks bad, reflects on your standing, makes people think you can't afford a stenographer, and is sometimes ambiguous.
You can write out your letters—make out an abstract—fill in an insurance policy—enter your card memos—make out your accounts, or a hotel menu—or do any kind of writing you need, on any kind, size or thickness of paper, and space any way you want on

The OLIVER Typewriter

The Standard Visible Writer.

You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.

Winning Lois

By FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1906, by Charles H. Sweet Co.

"What's that? How did I come to give my consent? Well, I don't know as I ever did. It was one of the things that just come about—happen, you know, as if 'twas made to be so. I never did have much use for white hands and store clothes and a soft voice. Seemed to me they went mostly with card sharps and men who wa'n't willing to work, and Lois felt the same. Her great idea in a man was courage, ready to risk life and all for anything that seemed right, especially if a woman was in it, and to us that kind of a man had big brown hands and broad back and loud voice, and he always wore rough clothes, which showed he wa'n't afraid to work and never thought about how he looked.

"So when Jim Furness saw her from a parlor car window one day and threw his baggage off and lost his ticket just through a crazy idea of winning her Lois turned him down so quick that I didn't have a chance to say a word, mad as I was. You know how Lois is when she's stirred up like this. She just looks and turns away, and there's no need for her nor anybody else to say a word.

"Well, with other folks that would have ended it, but Jim he just turned round and got a job firing on a local engine that helped pull freight up our side of the divide. You see, he seemed to understand by instinct that Lois and I believed in work and didn't care for dressed up effect. But, pshaw! You know how it is with Jim. Put him on the dirtiest job going and his hands will stay white and soft like a girl's, and the roughest clothes ever was have a way of hanging on him like they were tailor made, and, as to his voice, if you turned his engine end over and down the mountain, when it got to the bottom Jim's voice, if he had any left, would be as soft and drawling as ever.

"We saw a good deal of Jim now, for, with me as station agent and our living rooms upstairs, Lois and I were sort of chums with everything on the railroad. Maybe that was what started Jim to getting his job so quick and having it so he could switch back and forth in front of the station every few hours and stay in our town over night. Maybe he figured that just being a railroad man would be a sort of recommendation.

"But if so it didn't seem to help him much. There were big, strapping engineers on the road who had done things, risked life and looked square at death without winking, and there were conductors and section bosses and one local superintendent and a passenger agent who liked Lois and who would have been glad for her to have liked them, and nearly all had done things. You see, our section right along here is a tough piece of road, and all the employees who have been on it a few years and are not killed have stories to tell. Now I—but Lois hates personal talk that touches on brag, so it doesn't matter.

"But, as I was saying, pretty much the whole road liked Lois, and Lois, she liked the whole road as a whole, but wouldn't single out any one in particular. And, as for Jim, she scorned him openly, and he knew it.

"Now, I didn't like Jim myself, so of course I couldn't feel the pity for him that I would for anybody else. But, pshaw! If he felt it he never showed by any signs. He just came and took his scorn and joked and laughed and made us laugh and then came back for more scorn the very next time his engine pulled in. Now, I ask candidly what can you do with a fellow like that? The others laughed at him, and he laughed with them. Then after a while some of the more rough ones, thinking him soft and good natured and without backbone, went a little too far, and his white fingers closed together like steel springs, and more than one of them had to lay off for repairs. But Jim didn't seem to hold any grudges. He laughed and talked to those who treated him the worst until they had to laugh and talk back, and then the first anybody knew they were all the best of friends.

"But the strangest part, of course, was about Lois. Jim never did a single brave thing so far as I know, risk his life in saving a train of passengers or anything like that, and he spent a lot of money in helping people in one way and another—a good deal more than his salary could possibly amount to—and either of those things was enough to keep Lois scornful. She had no use at all for a man unless he was brave and no use for one who wasn't absolutely honest, and of course spending more than one earned would seem to have only one meaning.

"However, Jim kept right on in his quiet, good natured way until he had made the railroad men his friends, and even Lois and I began to look forward to his spending an evening, things went off so swinging and pleasant-like.

"No, I don't know as he ever did ask me in so many words for my consent or even if he asked Lois. It all came about as if 'twas made to be so, minister and all, and it wa'n't until after they were married and gone to his home that we found out he was one of the biggest owners of the railroad, with more money than he could throw away. That first time he saw Lois he was just from college and gone into partnership with his father and was taking an observation trip over their road.

"His father like it? Seemed so. Anyway he's never said or looked a word against it when I've been there, and he's just as proud of Lois as Jim himself. And Lois, why, up there the city is just full of society queens, as they call them, and Lois leads the whole lot—takes to it naturally, they say, just like she's always took to everything. I go up once a year, and they all treat me like a king, and Jim, especially if he's got some big nabob visiting, as he generally has, buttonholes me and tells that story about—but Lois hates personal talk that touches on brag, so it doesn't matter. You see, she might hear."

How She Cured Him.

An impecunious young lawyer whose lack of clients, says a writer in the New York Sun, has sometimes caused him to visit a pawnshop told the following story, in which the joke was on himself:

My mother gave me a gold watch, which was often of more service to me as a pledge on which to borrow money in a pawnshop than as a timepiece. It grieved her to know that I made such use of her gift, and several times she furnished the means of redeeming it.

One day, when I had gone a particularly long time without my watch, mother demanded the pawn ticket. Within a week she handed me my watch, and I promised, as usual, not to pawn it again. But the necessity returned, and I had recourse to the loan office.

The pawnbroker glanced at the timepiece and opened the inner case. His manner became formal. "Where did you get this watch?" he inquired.

"It was a present," I replied.

"Well, I'm going to hold it until you can prove it's yours," he declared, and then, by way of explanation, "I suppose you didn't read what's engraved on the case?"

"No," I said faintly.

"I'll read it to you: 'If this watch is offered for sale or pawn notify Mrs. ——, —— street. Reward.'"

There was nothing to do but go home and make a clean breast of it.

A Universal Language Exists.

"A universal language has existed since man's birth, the language of the gesture."

The speaker, an ethnologist, sharpened his left forefinger with his right forefinger as one sharpens a pencil.

"That gesture means 'Shame! Hiss for shame!' he said. "It means that the world over. Use it on a savage woman in New Guinea or on the king of England, and both alike will understand you."

He shook his fist.

"That is a threat," he said. "The world over it is a threat."

Holding his forefinger a little to the right of his face, he shook it.

"A warning," he said. "Wherever man exists, there the shaken forefinger means a warning."

"So," he concluded, "I could go on indefinitely, giving you one by one the signs that compose our universal gesture language. Since this language exists and since everybody understands it, I see no reason why new universal languages should be continually invented, particularly since these new ones are very difficult to learn."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Not All In the Air.

The incident below—which Daniel Colt Gilman, LL. D., late president of Johns Hopkins university, incorporated in his sheaf of remembrances, "The Launching of a University and Other Papers"—could not happen at the present time, when each new institution of learning has its millionaire sponsor. It belongs to the pioneer period of education, when starting a college meant breaking the wilderness.

A gentleman, President Gilman says, once introduced himself to Dr. Day, then president of Yale, as chancellor of a western state university.

"How large a faculty have you?" President Day inquired, with genuine interest.

"Not any," answered the western gentleman.

"Have you any library or buildings?"

"Not yet."

"Any endowment?"

"None."

"What have you, then?" persisted President Day.

The visitor's countenance brightened. "We have a very good charter," said he.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

¶ You make no mistake when you come to us with an order of printing

The Guard of the Christmas Gems

By James Raymond Perry

Copyright, 1905, by James Raymond Perry

BUT, after all, not forgetting the rocking horse charger, as gentle as he was spirited, or the belt and sword—that gilt hilted, bright bladed affair—or the fascinating air gun that would shoot crimson tipped darts with marvelous accuracy—not forgetting, indeed, any of the many delightful presents—the fact remained that quite the most enchanting thing on the Christmas tree was the wonderful dancing fiddler. He was barely a foot high and proportionately slender, but for all that he was a very lifelike little manikin. And the way he could dance and fiddle was a caution! His fiddling was pantomime; the little violin which he held so lovingly against his neck and which he scraped so industriously with his bow made no sound, but his dancing was quite the real thing, even if it was a kind of shuffle instead of the "light fantastic" kind. All you had to do to make him fiddle and dance was to wind up a spring tucked away somewhere under his little coat and off he would go as lively as you please.

Robbie at once named the dancing fiddler Sambo, because Sambo was the reputed name of a dusky fiddler who in summer often came up on his street with fiddle and song and a shuffly dance to coax the pennies of the pernicious young dwellers there. This little Christmas Sambo was not nearly as dark as the big summer Sambo, but he was quite dark nevertheless—after the style of a sun browned Italian. His garments, too, were gaudy and in keeping with the character. He had quite speaking dark eyes—this little manikin—and so well had his maker done his work that when Sambo got to scraping and dancing you had a droll sense that beneath his crimson waistcoat a tiny human heart must beat. He was that lifelike, you see.

Though Robbie belted his sword on at once he let it hang unnoticed at his side, and though he kept the air gun close by him he gave it but scant attention, so busy was he winding up the spring and watching Sambo fiddle and dance. Whether the little heart under the crimson vest finally rebelled at having to work so hard on Christmas eve—of all nights—or whether for other and more mechanical reasons, it is a fact that at last, after being freshly wound, the tired little fiddler refused to budge. Shake him as you would, not a scrape would he give to his bow or a shuffling push to his feet. Robbie viewed him with reproachful eyes.

"You probably wound him up too tight, Robbie," explained Mr. Wallace. "Just leave him till morning. Perhaps he'll be rested then and ready to dance some more. It's time little tots were abed now."

Reluctantly Robbie accepted the situation. He wished that among other presents might be one that carried with it permission on Christmas eve to sit up all night. When you have a Christmas tree only once a year you ought to have it for the whole of one night! It was pure waste of time and money to go to bed and leave it, still all a-shimmer, with candles not yet half burned out, before the clock even struck 10! But that was one of the ways of the world. Grownup folks, like papa and mamma, were very nice—very nice, indeed—because they made the Christmas tree for you and loaded it with dancing fiddlers and speckled chargers and guns and swords and all the rest, but for all that they didn't understand economy in such matters, and when he grew up and made Christmas trees for his children it should be an all night affair. There were some matters that needed reforming, and he would see that they got reformed when he grew up.

Robbie roused again when his father and mother softly entered the nursery a half hour later.

"Burglars would never think of looking for it here," he heard his mother say in a low tone. "Oh, Robert, aren't they beautiful! And you're such a dear to give them to me!" she added. And Robbie, again quite wide awake, saw his mother hold up to the light a string of very pretty beads—very, very pretty beads, Robbie thought, for they sparkled in the light very much as he had seen some dewdrops sparkling in the sunshine away back last summer—sparkled with such beautiful little flashes of blue and violet and orange and crimson that you almost wanted to shut your eyes to keep out the dazzle.

The string of beads must have been something very nice, Robbie was sure for his mamma's exclamations of pleasure when they were handed to her from the tree had attracted his notice for a moment, in spite of the lively stunt Sambo was at the time performing. He had seen the beads sparkling then and had thought he would like to have some just like them. They would look pretty tied around the speckled charger's neck. His mamma had put them round her neck, and they had looked very fine there, and they would look fine round the speckled charger's neck, even if his neck wasn't as round and white and pretty as mamma's. So for a moment Robbie was just a bit envious. Then he had looked back at Sambo, manfully scraping at the fiddle and dancing to its silent time, and his envy slipped away. Sambo was worth a hundred strings of beads, and papa had given Sambo to him instead of to mamma, so mamma ought to have the beads, and he was glad she'd got them, but a little sorry for her that she hadn't got a Sambo instead. Sambos must cost a great deal of money, though, and papa, rich as he was, couldn't be expected to buy two Sambos for the same Christmas. So it had been only a passing shadow for Robbie, so light and fleeting that it had scarcely dimmed the brilliancy of the Christmas tree at all.

But now Robbie was more certain than ever that the beads must be something very choice, else his mamma would not be so particular about hiding them away from robbers.

"I know where I'll put them," he heard her say as the box lid snapped down and shut in the beautiful beads—"in the fireplace right down in this corner. There! And this spray of holly thrown over it quite hides the box. No burglar would think of looking there for it. And tomorrow, Robert, you must put them in the safe deposit vault. It's too valuable a necklace to keep here in the house."

"Just look at Robbie! He's taken his sword and gun to bed with him!" she added, coming nearer the cot. "Why, you're awake, dearie, aren't you?" she smiled. Then she bent over and kissed him a second good night—such a beautiful, beautiful mamma she was when she got down close to kiss him!—and after they had smiled into each other's eyes and she had laid her soft cheek against his for one delicious moment she and papa went out, and it was dark again. But the dark was very nice and nothing whatever to be afraid of. Afraid! Why, there was his faithful gun right where he could lay his hand on it! It was on it this very minute! And just beyond was his trusty sword! And right there by the bedpost waited the speckled charger ready to flee with him if necessary. And over there by the chimney, standing guard, was Sambo, as true a sentinel as ever scraped a noiseless fiddle! So there was nothing at all to be afraid of, even if it was dark. And there were such sweet thoughts in his mind now that there would have been no room for fear even if there had been anything to be afraid of—thoughts wherein the speckled charger, the faithful gun and trusty sword and even the genial Sambo himself retreated into the background, while in the foreground, very near, was the vision of a lovely face with the tenderest and most beautiful eyes looking into his. So had he dropped to dreams again, forgetting the dear toys in the dearer love for his mamma.

He awakened a second time to behold a very different vision. At first he almost believed it was one of those horrible nightmares of which he had had not more than one or two during his short life. But even while almost believing it was one he knew quite well that it wasn't. He knew it was a man—a real, live, dreadful man—standing there within a foot of the bed and flashing a queer little beam of light around the room. The light behind the lantern was so dim that Robbie could scarcely make out the face of a man at all, but that only added to his conviction that the face was truly horrible, and he knew very well what the man was and what he was there for.

Robbie hadn't lived all his little life in a city house without knowing what a burglar was. True, he had never seen one before, but Charlie Stuart had told him only last week about one Charlie's father had seen, and he knew this was one because Charlie had said they carried those queer little lights with them. And now this one had come for those pretty beads. He felt quite sure of it because of what his mamma had said when she put the box in the fireplace—that no burglar would think of looking there for it. Robbie wondered if this burglar would think to. But, of course, he wouldn't, for hadn't his mamma said particularly that one wouldn't? Still he might, and they were such pretty beads, and his mamma had seemed to like them so much. It would be a shame if he should find them and carry them off and mamma should never see them again!

Robbie reached softly for his gun. Yes, there it was! And there, just beyond it, was the sword. And then suddenly he couldn't see the beam creeping up and down and round the room, but in place of it a quite small but dazzling light was right in front of his wide staring eyes, and he heard a voice not at all pleasant or kind, though it was low, saying: "Don't yer make a noise, kid! Not a sound, or I'll"— The unfinished threat was quite as terrible as if the burglar had gone into minute particulars of what he would do. But that unusual light in front of his eyes and the voice had completely unnerved Robbie, and he had no intention of making a noise—in fact, he couldn't have made one if he had tried. So when the burglar whispered hoarsely, "Where's them 'arklers hid?" Robbie was speechless. For another instant the bright light glared him in the face and then wavered away and wandered off over the room.

"I don't s'pose you kid knows," Robbie heard the voice mutter. Now was the time for him to reach for his gun and sword and gun were quite forgotten in the fearful fascination of watching the wandering beam of light and the dim figure behind it. Into the corner and out the beam fell, the speckled charger suddenly coming into relief and then disappearing as the ray rested on it a moment and then passed on.

"Moight 'a' hid 'em in the fireplace," speculated the burglar softly, and Robbie's heart sank. The pretty beads would be lost after all.

"Ah! What's that?" the man whispered sharply. Something by the fireplace had clicked in the stillness—a sharp click like that of a revolver, and swiftly the beam of the lantern sought the spot. At the same instant Robbie's eyes caught dimly the gleam of a raised weapon in the burglar's other hand.

Robbie's gaze followed to where the trembling beam rested. Whether, having heard the burglar mention the fireplace and knowing the concealed jewels were now in extreme peril, Sambo had concluded it was time for him to take a hand in the affair, or whether for other and less sentimental reasons, it is certain he had become an actor in the scene, for, with a click of his wound up spring, off he had started, and down there on the tiled hearth in the wavering light of the lantern he was industriously scraping away at his noiseless fiddle and vigorously shuffling through his grotesque dance.

The burglar uttered a relieved little laugh. "Sure, I thought 'twas some one," Robbie heard him mutter. The man stood for a moment watching the droll manikin, a grin on his rough features. Then he moved toward the fireplace again.

It cannot be asserted positively that the presence of the burglar and the peril of the pretty beads now caused the heart of the faithful Sambo to burst with emotion, but certainly a strange thing happened, for just as the burglar was again stepping toward the fireplace the silent fiddling ceased, and there was a buzz and whir and vibrant twang as if a dozen clock springs had suddenly started to rattle and hum in unmusical chorus. Something in little Sambo's bosom had given way and released the coiled springs that controlled him, and it was these that were making a wild tattoo as they unwound with a rush against wall and tiling. The commotion had not ceased when there was the sound of some one bounding out of bed in the next room, and, with a half smothered oath, the burglar turned and fled to the window through which he had climbed.

And now Robbie boasts proudly to the other little boys on his street, albeit a little sadly in spite of the new Sambo his father bought him, how the old Sambo gave up his life to save his mamma's string of pretty beads.

NOTES BY THE WAY

Mr. E. W. Kelso Writes of His Travels to New Mexico.

To the Editor of The Republican.

I left Oakland January 11th on train 55 to visit my son in Las Cruces, New Mexico. I stopped one day in Greenfield, Ohio, with James Kelso, in a prosperous town of 5,000 population, containing many fine buildings, among the number a M. E. church costing $75,000; one padding factory for horse collars, employing six hundred persons. The daily output is immense, using twenty tons of strap steel monthly for making pad hooks.

I continued my journey, arriving in St. Louis the 13th and remained with Jonas Simon, a former Garrett countian, until the 15th, when I took the Cotton Belt R. R., traveling through Missouri, Arkansas and Louisiana. As our train glided through Red River valley, I saw a hundred or more colored women and children picking the last ripening crop of cotton.

The soil is red and very productive. It is interesting to note the adaptability of the soil. Some planted in cotton, corn and alfalfa all adjoining. Alfalfa was about six inches high, thick on ground and dark green color.

Arriving in Shreveport, La., I found a thriving city of thirty thousand population, with nine railroads, street cars, waterworks, etc I found the weather warm and nice, thermometer registering 70 in the shade.

Our train missing connection, we remained until 9 p. m., bound for Houston, Texas. The country between Shreveport and Houston has many saw mill plants, and in Humble, Texas, quite an oil field. Through the timbers and streets of small towns the razor-back hog is much in evidence.

We saw large flocks of goats and about one hundred Jersey cows near Houston. We took a side trip to Alvin, 25 miles south of Houston, and saw thousands of cattle feeding on prairie, apparently in good condition. Alvin is a small town, where early vegetables and strawberries are shipped by the car load. The shipping season is now on. Houston has a population of 72,000 and all modern improvements. The country between Houston and San Antonio is slightly rolling and covered partly with mesquite brush. It is similar to tug alder, but much larger.

I arrived in San Antonio this morning and visited the historical points of interest. Three artesian wells in the southern suburbs from 1,800 to 2,000 feet deep, discharge with force over 800,000 gallons each day of hot sulphur water with a temperature from 103 to 106. Seventeen large iron bridges span the San Antonio river in the center of the city.

The growth of the city in 1906 averaged 101 residents per month. I am told the city has a population of 92,000.

San Antonio is the home of the "Alamo," where Crockett and Bowie met death in the horrible massacre which occurred within its sacred walls, in which they had taken refuge for defense and safety. Here also, are the old missions. Mission Conception, the first, about two miles from the city, Mission San Jose and Mission San Juan. San Antonio has many other historical points of interest. Here also is Fort Sam Houston, one of the largest forts in the United States.

I will leave in a few minutes for El Paso, a distance of 600 miles.

Obituary.

James J. Ryland, of near Selbysport, this county, departed this life December 27th, 1906, at the age of sixty-eight years and sixteen days after a lingering illness of several months, which he suffered with great patience without murmur or complaint. Mr. Ryland spent his life in this county where he was well known and respected by all with whom he had either business or friendly intercourse.

While the greater part of his life was spent without the church which he occasionally criticised because professing Christians did not measure up to his ideal (and no Christian yet ever measured up to what a worldly mind thinks he ought to be, and never will), nevertheless it is pleasant to record that Mr. Ryland made a confession of saving faith in Christ, the Son of God, in which he earnestly repented of his sins, the criticisms he had offered to His Church, saying, "I am now ready to die whenever the Lord sees fit to call me," and was admitted to the membership of the Methodist Episcopal church some months before his death.

Mrs. Amanda Ryland, his widow, three brothers, and five sisters survive to mourn their loss, which has become his gain. G. W. Ryland has been a banker for many years, and has served two terms as lieutenant governor in the state of Wisconsin where he still resides. S. H. Ryland lives at Myersdale, Pa., and the third brother, William Ryland, lives in Friendsville, Md. His sisters are: Mrs. Harriet Liston, aged 83, of Selbysport, Md., Mrs. Mary Coddington, of Elder, Md., Mrs. Malinda Kelley, of Cranesville, W. Va., Mrs. Elvira Frazee, of Elder, Md., and Mrs. Hannah Frazee, of Frazee Ridge, Md.

One of the favorite hymns that the deceased heard so often sung by his friends around his bedside is:

"My Father's house is bright and fair,
Nor pain nor death can enter there;
Its glittering tower the sun out-shine,
That heavenly mansion shall be mine."

A FRIEND.

New Postmaster in Charge.

Mr. James C. Peddicord, who was recently appointed postmaster at Oakland, took charge of his office Monday morning. His assistant is his sister, Mrs. Ella M. Miller.

DEATH OF PERRY E. KIMMELL.

Passing of a Young Man Well Known In Oakland.

The death of Perry E. Kimmell which occurred at Grafton, West Va., Monday evening of this week, removed a most popular and amiable young man at sterling worth and integrity, one who was looked upon as of more than ordinary ability, of quick and perceptive mind, intellectual and withal most exemplary. For many years he was a trusted and highly esteemed employe of this office, at times assuming the responsibilities of editor and general manager, ever true to his trust. His friends have lost one whose place it will be hard to fill.

The following tribute to the memory of our deceased friend was published in the Grafton Sentinel of Tuesday:

"Last evening at seven o'clock the angel of death visited the Grafton Sanitarium and in taking his flight he bore with him the soul of Perry E. Kimmell. The end came after one of the most valiant struggles for life ever witnessed at the institution. Since Friday night the patient had been practically hovering between life and death, and to the watching friends and relatives it seemed that almost every breath would be the last, yet when the end came the spirit passed peacefully out to meet its God. The remains were removed to the McCabe undertaking rooms where they were prepared for burial and were later taken to the residence of Mrs. Bird Lake, on Dewey avenue, West Side, from where the funeral is announced to occur on Thursday afternoon at two o'clock.

"The deceased was born near Oakland, Md., in 1871, and when but a child moved with his parents to Oakland. He was the youngest son of Christian and Susan Kimmell, the mother having preceded him to the grave but a few years. After attending the public schools of Oakland he engaged in the printing business, which he followed for some years, going from there to Cumberland, where he was employed on a daily paper. Later he came to Grafton, and worked for awhile with Mr. Jas. M. Litzinger of the Leader, but after a few months accepted a situation on the Daily Sentinel where he remained for two-and-a-half years, leaving that situation last summer to engage in business for himself, leasing, and later purchasing, the Eclipse Printery. Mr. Kimmell was a hard-working, earnest young man, and his business was just beginning to pay good returns.

"From the first day that he came to Grafton Mr. Kimmell made friends, and at the time of his death he was well and favorably known throughout the entire city, and was highly respected by all who knew him. He was large in stature, robust, fine looking and usually the picture of health, yet he had been ill frequently since coming to Grafton, and when he was attacked with typhoid fever nearly three weeks ago his friends all feared the result. At the time he was taken ill he occupied rooms in the Walters flat on Main street, and just two weeks ago today he was removed to the Grafton Sanitarium. A few days later he was in the delirium of fever. Later meningitis set in, and despite every effort of the most skilled physicians of the city, aided by special nurses from Cook's Hospital at Fairmont, the patient grew steadily worse. He said on last Thursday evening that he would not get well, and asked his nurses to discontinue giving him medicine. Despite all encouragement that could be offered by friends and relatives, the patient appeared to realize that his lease on life was ebbing away. One of the most faithful attendants at the bedside was Miss Grace Lake and her mother, Mrs. Bird Lake, the daughter being the affiance of Mr. Kimmell, and the presence of the young lady at the bedside brought great comfort to the sufferer. To Rev. C. L. Queen, who was with him frequently, on the last day of his illness Mr. Kimmell expressed the thought, with a smile, that he was not afraid to die, and that all was well with him. He had attended Rev. Queen's church (the Methodist Protestant) quite regularly for some time past, and a fast friendship had grown up between the pastor and the young man.

"Mr. Kimmell was a young man of high moral character, open-hearted, frank, upright, trustworthy and ever true to his obligations. Those of our people who have had business dealings with him found him satisfactory in every respect, while his high standing in the community in which he has resided for about three years attests far better to the esteem in which he was held than could eloquently worded newspaper articles. Of his immediate family he leaves to mourn their great loss, an aged father, at present residing with a daughter at Belington; two brothers—Messrs. Thos. Kimmell, of Fairmont, and William Kimmell of Thayerville, Md., and two sisters, Mrs. Flowers of Belington and Mrs. Flowers of Grafton, the latter residing on Walnut street, West Side. The father is at this time quite ill, and also the brother at Thayerville has been confined to his bed for some weeks past. To the bereaved relatives and friends the sympathy of a host of our people is extended."

Died.

KING—At the residence of her son, Joseph W. King, near Gorman, on January 23rd, 1907, of a complication of diseases, Mrs. Lucinda King, aged 83 years, wife of Mr. Jessie King, who is 89 years of age. The deceased lady was a member of the M. E. church and by precept and example followed the teachings of the church throughout her long life. Besides her husband she is survived by six children: Joseph W., Mrs. Amy White and Mrs. Susan Solomon, of Garrett county; Israel and Jonathan King and Mrs. Lizzie Guseman, of Uniontown, Pa. Her funeral will occur tomorrow at 10.30 o'clock.

THRASHER—At his home in Deer Park on Tuesday afternoon at one o'clock, after a brief illness, William W. Thrasher, aged forty-nine years. He leaves besides his wife eight children, several of whom are grown to womanhood and manhood. His funeral took place today from his late residence.

WORLDLINESS.

Some better word than "worldliness" ought to be invented to characterize the condition of men and women who neglect to cultivate the religious side of life according to the traditions that have prevailed in the churches. As the word is used from many pulpits there is in it a misleading implication that the affairs of this world of ours are in some way unworthy of the attention of Christian people. Preachers sometimes seem to indicate by their exhortations and their prayers that Christian men and women ought to cease thinking about this world and devote their attention exclusively to a consideration of some other world.

Most people understand, of course, that these ministerial warnings and exhortations are aimed at the tendency of people to think only of the concerns of the physical and material side of life, neglecting the culture of character and the development of personality along spiritual and ethical lines. There is danger, however, in any loose use of words, and it is to be feared that too many, both in pulpit and in pew, simply make a mental catalogue of a job lot of good, bad and indifferent activities and interests, and clap the label "worldly" on them, and from that time forth feel that some discredit attaches to such things per se.

In the minds of some good people, too, there may arise a confusion of thought as to the value of mere sentimental speculation about some vague idea of a sorrowless, self-indulgent, toil-free existence in some other world, as compared with a life of efficient service in the very good world in which we happen to find ourselves just now. This world and the people in it and their activities and interests are, and ought to be, the chief present concern of every thoughtful man and woman. The world's work and its play, its laughter and its tears, its victories and its defeats, even its foibles, its sins and its crimes—the whole broad range of our humanity's experience in this present life—all these should come within the ken and the sympathy of the man who wants to serve his fellow men up to the limit of his ability and opportunity.

That kind of other-worldliness which narrows men's sympathies which renders them censorious and intolerant, which makes men thank God that they are not as other men are, which prompts men to make their conscience do duty for their neighbors, to set themselves apart from the rest of the world and to hold themselves aloof from its activities, as from pollution—such ideals of unworldliness, fortunately, have little vogue in this our day, and the sooner they disappear from pulpit and pew, the better for both.

That time-honored "evil trinity," as it has been called, the world, the flesh and the devil, has no fundamental bond of unity. His Satanic Majesty ought to have nothing to do with either of the others. The right kind of worldliness is certainly better than the wrong kind of other-worldliness.

Court House Commission to Meet.

State Senator W. McCulloh Brown, who is secretary of the Court House Commission, has notified this office that a meeting of the Commission will be called for Friday, February 1st, when Chief Judge Boyd will be present and at which time the architects selected by the Commission to make drawings of the proposed building will have their plans ready.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

The change in the institutes from one day to two days' sessions has been hailed with great delight by the teachers of the county. Let everyone make an effort to attend some of them and to take active part.

Return at once the postals, obligating yourselves to read these columns each week, if you have not already done so. It is never too late to do good.

Several articles are now being prepared which will be of more widespread interest than those previously published. They will deal with the duties of trustees and parents in making our school system more perfect.

The following interesting article has been received for publication in the series. It should be productive of great good to the schools of our county:

A FIELD FOR CONQUEST.

Allow me to speak of a work most necessary to be done; a work which many teachers, either because of a false modesty or a lack of knowledge, entirely ignore. I will place it under three heads:

1. IMMORAL LANGUAGE. The playground is often a hot-bed of profanity as well as obscenity. Here are the children of the most immoral families as well as of the most moral. While here they consider themselves neither at home nor in school, they think themselves lords of the play-ground, and here we see them at their worst. The boy who can deliver the longest and vilest oath is the "hero of the hour." The most obscene stories are rehearsed amid shouts of boyish applause. The presence of young girl playmates often aggravates rather than lessens the evil. With the one and one-half hour of intermission each day under such influences is it any wonder that many of the intellectual seeds we sow fall on stony ground, or wither for want of root?

2. IMMORAL SYMBOLS. This is one of the most prolific sources of evil in our schools. The influence of the profane word and vile story is half dead when the sound of the voice which uttered them has died away. Not so with the penciled or knife-carved symbols. Their influence is fully alive term after term, year after year. Boys have often been seen looking upon these seeds of evil, sown by their fathers in their school days, while the vile story is heard only by the little group gathered around the speaker; but the symbols are read by every passer-by, whether teacher or pupil, boy or girl. Shall we, as teachers, permit the walls dedicated to the goddess of learning and culture, to be engraved as a scroll with the symbols of degradation and sin? Shall we allow the walls of the temple of knowledge to be turned into an object chart for the kindergarten of Satan?

3. IMMORAL ASSOCIATIONS. Many a divorce case has been begun on the playground of the public school. The unrestained mingling of the sexes in all positions and places is productive of sad results. We overlook entirely what we would not allow for a moment among pupils of an advanced age. We think that because they are children they should receive larger license. The very fact that they are children make prohibitions all the more necessary. Nor is the indiscriminate mingling of the sexes the only evil associations of the playground. There are those of the same sex that delight to spread immorality among their companions. Our playgrounds could be filled with the graves of those whose lives have been wrecked in this way.

The question may next arise, what may be done to hinder these immoralities? The answer of which may be given in next issue, as want of time prevents it now.

CONTRIBUTION No. 6.

Passing of Ginseng Craze.

The ginseng cultivation fever, which was at its height four or five years ago, like most other agricultural fads, proved a disappointment to the enthusiast. A representative of The Rural New Yorker, who recently visited three ginseng plantations of considerable size, three or four years old, reports that they were all suffering from a disease peculiar to this plant.

It will be remembered that it takes the ginseng root five or six years to mature, so that when a plantation, after two or three years of care and waiting, is affected with blight, the resulting crop failure is much more serious than with almost any other crop.

The productiveness of two of the plantations were so seriously affected that they had been practically abandoned, while the third plantation, although damaged to a less extent, had not begun to pay expenses.

Allegany Surveys Boundary.

William Harvey, surveyor of Allegany county, has completed the survey of the boundary line between Garrett and Allegany counties under the direction of the commissioners of the latter. The boundary is in dispute and Garrett will not give up the rich strip of mineral land to Allegany without a struggle.

The boundary is laid off with the stone posts a mile apart. The Chisholm line was followed, but the Garrett people contend that the law says the line shall meet the Mason and Dixon line at the highest point of Savage mountain, while the Chisholm line does not meet the Mason and Dixon line on Savage mountain, but on the western slope of Little Savage mountain.

The International Sunday School Lesson.

First Quarter. Lesson IV. Genesis iv, 3-15. January 27, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

The Story of Cain and Abel.

The next picture flashed upon the inimitable canvas of Genesis shows the seed of God and the seed of the serpent in that mortal combat which had just been foretold. The tragic scene holds the eye. The stream of human life seems there to part. On the one hand it flows in larger volume casting up mire and dirt, foaming out its own shame, sending forth its ominous detonations, falling at length with a Niagara roar into the abyss of hell. The smaller stream has a gentle flow. Heaven is mirrored on its surface. It empties at length into the sea of glass before the throne.

The eldest brothers of the race, at the close of a heptade, approach the gate of the lost paradise, where there was a permanent theophany, a pre-Mosaic shekinah, flaming from between the sentinel cherubim. They build their respective altars; it is possibly the very first instance of sacrifice.

Cain, in his perversity, chose to make a eucharistic offering, an oblation signifying only gratitude. He was not even particular that his fruits should be the first of their kind. He presented his own works. There was no confession, contrition, or faith. The only motive was to "keep on good terms with God." Cain was the progenitor of the long line of Pharisees, unhappily not yet extinct, who go to the temple to make an exhibition of themselves and their good works.

Abel made a piacular sacrifice, as well as a eucharistic one. That he offered both is sufficiently indicated by the expression in Hebrews, God testifying of his gifts. But the expiatory offering is the more conspicuous. It was choice; the fattest of the firstlings. In it there was a confession of sin, an expression of faith. Abel is first of the long line of publicans who have since gone down to their homes justified after having laid all their deadly doing down, and cried, "God be merciful to me a sinner."

There was no arbitrary election of Abel, or reprobation, or even preterition, of Cain. The case was decided by the subjective state and intent of the worshiper's heart. The form and quality of the gift was the material and objective expression of this. Abel's offering complied exactly with the form no doubt explicitly prescribed. It was therefore an expression of obedience. So by faith Abel offered a greater (literally) sacrifice than Cain. God turned the light of his countenance upon Abel's lamb with its ensanguined fleece, and set it on fire.

That moment another, a hateful flame, sprung up in Cain's heart—malicious envy! murderous jealousy! His lofty pride in himself and the fruits of his industry was cut to the quick. I have never seen it hinted anywhere, but why should it be thought improbable that this whole scene, evidently exemplary and educative, should have transpired in full view of a large congregation? That there was already a considerable population is indicated in this very chapter. This affords additional explanation of the superlative degree of Cain's disappointment and anger.

The long-suffering patience of God! He is not willing that any shall perish. To the disappointed man standing beside his flameless altar and rejected offering, himself all aflame with murderous passion, his downcast face indicating that he was brooding a deed never done before, God spoke from the shekinah, persuasively, but firmly: "If you had brought the prescribed offering and in the right spirit, yours would have been as certainly accepted as your brother's. It is not too late for you yet to go and get a lamb, a sin offering. It is just to your hand. You have not quite lost your right of primogeniture. Your brother will still submit to your rule." But Cain is obdurate. To all intents he is damned before he is dead.

He beguiles his brother into the open. He mockingly preaches to him there. He blasphemously rails against God's impartiality, until his fiery speech, like intoxicating liquor, has nerved him to his deed. He strikes the fratricidal blow.

How soon at best judgment and retribution follow the sinner! There is neither escape nor appeal from the Great White Throne. The cumulative and defiant power of sin manifests itself. Adam fled. Cain dared approach the Theophany after his deed. Adam confessed. Cain denied, with insolent additions.

Cain's repentance was judicial. It was the groan or the villain who feels the halter draw. Like all murderers, "he sees the earth full of avengers," and is in terror.

In the first great contest between the serpent seed and the seed of God, the latter, as in many a subsequent encounter, seems to be in defeat. But, after all, it is only the heel that is wounded. Abel survives in those who imitate him. Though dead, he speaks. Jesus ranks him head of all the holy martyrs.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Sin's hideous features stand out in blackest silhouette in this paragraph. Adam and Eve realize the hateful stream of hereditary influences their sin has started down the ages. How poignant the first mother's disappointment when she discovers that he, whom with "womanly precipitancy" she had called the "Gotten One," turned out to be not a "crusher of the serpent," but one of the serpent's seeds! That motherly foreboding which led her to name her second son "swiftly disappearing breath of life," had a terrible realization. Well may Schiller sing:

"That evil deed's avenging curse it is That evil evermore it shall beget."

* * * * *

These lessons reveal God as directly interested and watchful in the moral actions of His intelligent creatures. God is more concerned in men than He is in worlds and systems. His regard has not abated, though sixty centuries have passed. Their infinite multiplication and the interminable maze of the interlacing interests can never outgrow the powers of His infinite mind. God knows us as intimately as He did Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, and nothing can be hid from Him with whom we have to do.

* * * * *

God is after the sinner. He was on Adam's track before sundown, and Cain's as early. His fateful questions, Where art thou? Who told thee? Hast thou eaten? Where is thy brother? What is this that thou hast done? still ring in the guilty conscience.

* * * * *

The motives and modes of worship are here portrayed. There is no finer commentary upon the incomparable parable of the Pharisee and Sinner. How many vain offerings and gifts! They amount to nothing. The answer will be, "I never knew you!" The crucial test of destiny in the attitude of the soul toward the Lamb once offered.

* * * * *

Golden moments,—don't lose them, allowing any one to chatter about such insignificrnt matter, for example, as "Cain's mark." It was not a mystic letter on the brow, or a horn growing out of the forehead, or a robe, or an attendant dog. In fact, in was nothing on Cain at all; but God appointed to Cain a token or sign (as He gave the rainbow to Noah), to assure him he should not be killed. "Why didn't God allow Cain to be killed." Not because He needed him to keep seed alive on the earth, but to show that "tares are to grow with wheat, and sin develop itself to the utmost extent."

* * * * *

A lesson with application this! Don't fail to press it lovingly; but press it. Which altar is yours, Cain's or Abel's? The moralist stands at Cain's altar, and is nigh to cursing. Abel's altar of faith is the way to salvation.

LARGEST BATTLE SHIP IN WORLD.

The Dreadnought to Be Seen at the Jamestown Ter-Centennial Exposition.

The monster battleship, "Dreadnought," the largest man-of-war in the world, Great Britain's latest acquisition, will participate in the grand naval display in Hampton Roads, during the period of the Jamestown Ter-Centennial Exposition. The famous sea fighter is now on her way to the West Indies, where she will be seen by Admiral Evan's fleet, which is carrying on winter manoeuvres in those waters. It is the opinion of the British consul there that the Dreadnought will remain in the southern waters of the West Indies until the winter is over, arriving in Hampton Roads in time for the opening of the Jamestown Exposition on April 26th, remaining there until the British fleet, detailed for participation at the Exposition, is ready to return home.

The Dreadnought was only a short time ago put into commission after having been a remarkably short period in building. She is of 18,000 tons displacement and has an armament of ten twelve-inch guns, or nearly three times the gun strength of any other battleship afloat. This vessel has a speed of more than twenty knots an hour and could therefore overtake any combination she can fight or run away from any she cannot.

Besides this visit of the Dreadnought, England, through the admiralty's late decision, will send her first cruiser division to Hampton Roads for the opening celebration of the Jamestown Exposition. The vessels comprising this division are the Good Hope, Antrim, Argyle, Devonshire, Hampshire and Roxburgh. These ships will probably give England a stronger representation in the naval manoeuvres in Hampton Roads than any of the other foreign powers that are to participate.

$150,000 FOR NEW PYTHIAN CASTLE.

Building Association With That End in View Formed Recently.

BALTIMORE, Jan. 21.—The first steps for the raising of a fund of $150,000 for the building of a new castle for the Grand Lodge of the Knights of Pythias of the Domain of Maryland were taken last night at a meeting held at the castle on North Gay street.

In order to raise the necessary fund a building association, to be known as the Maryland Pythian Building Association was formed, the organizers being Messrs. John T. Thomas, president; George Raub, vice president; William L. Beau, treasurer, Louis L. Shinnamon, secretary; directors, the officers named and Messrs. G. L. Pfisterer, H. M. Cotton, William Rosskamp, John P. Lauber, W. L. DuRell and George W. Stephens; assistant secretaries, Messrs. E. H. Konow, Charles Hood and Wm. T. Walters, Jr.

The association will be incorporated in the near future by a committee comprised of the president, vice president, treasurer and secretary and Mr. John P. Lauber.

It is the intention to sell the stock of the association and invest the funds pending the carrying out of the project. It has been definitely determined that the new castle will not be erected on the site of the old one, but as yet the new location has not been secured.

THE BATTLE IS TO A FINISH.

National Administration Making War on Railroads.

WILL ENTER THE CAMPAIGN

Of 1908—People Do Not Fully Appreciate the Bitterness of the Battle. Will Be Remembered for Years to Come.

Washington, Jan. 22.—It is seriously to be doubted whether the country comes anywhere near to appreciating the significance of the attack all along the line that the Roosevelt Administration is making on the railroads of the United States. The casual reader doubtless notes that some action is being taken in this court and another in that but perhaps he does notstop to reflect upon the meaning and consequences involved. As a matter of fact, the administration is engaged in a most desperate battle with the railroad interests at the present moment, the echo of which will be heard in the court for several years to come and in the next national campaign. The bitterness of the fight is not shown to the country, but is evidenced in the multiplicity of attack now being pushed by the administration, on the one hand, and the political maneuvering going on among the railroad and financial interests to sign the death warrant of Rooseveltian policies, on the other. There can be no doubt that the fight is to be to a finish.

Under the direction of the President all departments of the Government are waging war against the biggest game they can find. The Interstate Commerce Commission is after the Harriman and Hill interests in the railroading; the Bureau of Corporations is after the Standard Oil Co., for taking rebates; the Interior Department is after the biggest game it can scare up in the land-fraud cases, including the railroads; the Postoffice Department is preparing is preparing to whale the railroads on their mail contracts; the Agricultural Department is on the trail of the packers and food manufacturers in the enforcement of the pure food law, which they cannot ship as inter-state commerce unless properly labeled, and so on down the line. Only the War and Navy Departments, "the dogs of real war," have not yet been "sicked" on the "enemies of the Republic." In this fight the activities of all departments pale into insignificance before the onslaught of the Inter-State Commerce Commission.

To begin with, it must be understood that whenever the Inter-State Commerce Commission becomes aggressive it is reasonably certain that in the end, if the new rate law is effective, the ruling of the Commission will cost the railroads money. Every time the Commission passes on the reasonableness of a railroad rate, and finds against the railroads, it costs them money; every recommendation for a safety device, if enacted into law by Congress, will cost them money: every inquiry into illegal mergers, if found to be illegal, will cost them money; every suit won in court for rebating will cost them money. In respect to having its pocketbook touched a corporation has as much "soul" as a human being. This, in part, accounts for the bitterness of the present warfare.

FIFTY YEARS AGO.

Time When It Took Ten Days to Go From Wheeling to Baltimore.

T. H. Murphy, of Parkersburg, recalls the following interesting event of fifty years ago:

"The Christmas of 1906 brings back vividly to my mind the Christmas of 1856, just fifty years ago. That year there had not been a frost or any sign of winter up to Christmas eve, when it started to snow about 10 o'clock in the morning, and before Christmas morning the snow was two feet deep. Then it begun to get cold and in a little while the mercury dropped below zero. A blizzard set in and in a little time the snow drifted until practically all traffic ceased. The trains on the Baltimore & Ohio railroad were tied up for days, and it took ten days for a freight train to go from Wheeling to Baltimore. Much stock perished from cold and hunger before they could reach their destination. Many train crews opened the cars and drove the stock to haystacks and in that way some were saved.

"The passenger trains were tied up at different points, sometimes miles away from a town or settlement, and passengers and crews endured a great deal of suffering. They had to get out and break down fences and gathered brushwood for fires to keep from freezing until the rescue parties, whom the railroad company started out to aid them safely through. This was one of the severest in the memory of man in this vicinity. The Baltimore & Ohio railroad was finished in 1856, and the men who worked on it were all leaving to work on the Louisville & Nashville. They had gathered at St. Marys to take a boat down the Ohio river. The river froze up and was frozen over for forty days, hence they were unable to proceed on their journey, and their sufferings from cold and lack of nourishment were extreme.

"The next two winters were record breakers in a way but could not come up to '56."—Parkersburg Sentinel.

THE B. & O. R. R. IS ARRAIGNED

Charged With Being Member of Gigantic Coal Trust and Owner of Private Cars.

Hidden away in the legal verbiage of the suit over car shortage of the independent coal operators against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad is the charge that the railroad is a party to one of the biggest coal trusts in the United States, and that the transportation line really owns a large part of the private cars, which it allots to favored shippers.

The largest coal shippers over Baltimore and Ohio are the Consolidation, Somerset and Fairmont companies in which it was acknowledged the Baltimore and Ohio owned stock up to the time the Supreme Court of the United States decided no common carrier could own coal mines along its route. As a result the Baltimore and Ohio announced last summer it had disposed of its holdings in the coal corporations.

The Pitcairn Coal Company, which brings the suit against the Baltimore and Ohio, in the name of all the independent operators in the Somerset region, over their car shortage question, makes the bold assertion that this deal was never consummated, and that the Baltimore and Ohio still controls the three biggest coal mining corporations shipping over its lines. The allegation is made that a small sum of money and the stock control of the coal company passed to a trustee who holds the corporations for the railroad company.

The Baltimore and Ohio has owned the Consolidation Company, which owns the Fairmont Company. The Fairmont Company owns the Clarksburg Fuel Company, and the Pittsburg and Fairmont Fuel Company. The Consolidation Company also owns the Somerset Coal Company, the Southern Coal and Transportation Company, and the Cumberland and Pennsylvania Railroad.

This combination is capitalized at $37,000,000, and mines 4,000,000 tons of coal annually, running fleets to New England ports, ships in the foreign trade, and has an extensive trade in the Pittsburg district and on the Great Lakes.

It is charged that of the 2,560 cars which the Baltimore and Ohio placed at the disposal of the mines on the Monongahela division in one month, the Fairmont Company alone got 1,762, leaving but 799 for thirty-odd independent mine owners.

It is also alleged that the Baltimore and Ohio owns the private cars bearing names of coal-mining corporations, and that both the Somerset and Fairmont companies have the exclusive use of thousands of them, 6,433 being assigned the Fairmont Company.

W. M. R. NOW OWNS GEORGE'S CREEK.

Wabash Interests Take Over Valuable Coal Road Property With Equipment.

The Western Maryland railroad on Thursday took over the entire capital stock of the Georges Creek and Cumberland railroad company. It will proceed at once to assume the official organization and operation of the property.

The George Creek railroad runs from Cumberland to Detmold Mine, Lonaconing, Md., and with branches, has 32.59 miles of track. It has 10 locomotives and 861 cars. The capital stock is $1,000,000, par $50. The bonded debts of the road are $536,000 first 6s, dated 1879 and due October 1, 1909; interest April and October, at American Coal company, New York. There is also a second-mortgage loan, not represented by bonds, of $65,000, due February 1, 1908, assumed from the Pennsylvania Railroad in Maryland.

The earnings of the road for the year ended June 30, 1905, were: Gross, $279,061; net, $140,751; other income, $3,181; charges, $43,811; dividends, $150,000. Deficit for year, $59,879.

The managemeut is: President and general manager, James A. Millholland, Cumberland; vice president, Sidney Wintringham; secretary and treasurer, William De L. Walbridge, New York; directors, James A. Millholland, Charles L. F. Robinson, William De L. Walbridge, Sidney Wintringham, New York; Jeseph E. Gay, Jaffray, N. H.

The Georges Creek and Cumberland is a coal road and was owned by coal operating interests. It was a natural step for the Western Maryland to take over this road, and much of the product of this part of the Georges Creek coal region will go to Baltimore over the Western Maryland.

It is said that the acquisition of this road has no connection with the propose Cumberland extension to Wheeling and Pittsburg. However, it would give a start of one and a half miles on such an extension and would afford a route through "the narrows", an exceptionally difficult region for construction work.

"SAVED MY LIFE"

—That's what a prominent druggist said of Scott's Emulsion a short time ago. As a rule we don't use or refer to testimonials in addressing the public, but the above remark and similar expressions are made so often in connection with Scott's Emulsion that they are worthy of occasional note. From infancy to old age Scott's Emulsion offers a reliable means of remedying improper and weak development, restoring lost flesh and vitality, and repairing waste. The action of Scott's Emulsion is no more of a secret than the composition of the Emulsion itself. What it does it does through nourishment—the kind of nourishment that cannot be obtained in ordinary food. No system is too weak or delicate to retain Scott's Emulsion and gather good from it.

The Standard Visible Writer.
You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.

To Whose Advantage?

By HOWARD FIELDING

Copyright, 1906, by Charles W. Hooke

FRANK CLIFFORD was heir to a large estate, and his uncle, Duncan Clifford, was trustee, with power to do about as he pleased. I had never met the uncle, but he had been described to me as a strange animal, part mule and part monkey, incredibly obstinate, yet fantastically unstable of purpose. One day I received an earnest request from Frank to meet him that evening in Branford, N. J., where his uncle lived.

We were to meet in a little hotel at 10 o'clock, and as my train arrived before 9 I decided to view the quaint old town by the light of the moon. One small white building I was led to notice particularly.

It must once have been the village schoolhouse, but was now a millinery store kept by a Mrs. Esther Wilson, as the sign informed me. I ventured to guess that Mrs. Wilson lived over her store, for there was a light in the gable window, from which, as I glanced up, the curtain was pushed partly away, revealing a woman, who dodged back as if alarmed. It is a curious circumstance that I happened to notice in the hand with which she awkwardly thrust aside the curtain a small drinking glass.

Taking a few more steps, I came in view of an exterior stairway by which the second story of the house was reached, and at the foot of the stairs there was a man seated.

This man's attitude, coupled with my glimpse of the wineglass, conveyed a very unpleasant suggestion. This inert figure might be Mr. Wilson, a drunkard and a squanderer of the little milliner's meager earnings, and it was with this idea in mind that I approached him and laid my hand, not very gently, upon his shoulder. At the touch he slid down sidelong and lay at my feet, and I knew at a glance that he was dead.

He was past fifty years of age and of distinguished appearance, but the countenance was marred by an irritable, hostile expression.

The street was well nigh deserted, doubtless because of the unusual cold. The neighboring stores were closed except for a tobacconist's, which I had noticed because the proprietor seemed to be the village jeweler also, and I had thought the combination odd. It seemed best to carry the body to that store, and I had set myself to the task when the door at the head of the stairs opened, and Mrs. Wilson, as I rightly guessed, came out hurriedly. She saw me hoisting up this dead man in my arms, and she screamed.

"The man is ill," said I. "Do you know who he is?"

She had uttered only a single cry. Now she stood stock still, staring down at me.

"I am going to take him into the tobacco store," said I.

"No!" She spoke the single word and then checked herself as with an effort.

The voice, though heard in so brief and strained an utterance, increased my vague impression of recognition, but the dead man was becoming heavy in my arms, and I decided to follow my original purpose. It was only a few steps to the store, but nearly a score of people gathered about me before I traversed the distance. Some one opened the door, and that was all the help I received.

The tobacconist-jeweler was not there, having run out perhaps at the sound of the woman's scream. I laid my burden upon the floor, and instantly half a dozen voices cried out:

I KNEW AT A GLANCE THAT HE WAS DEAD.

"It's Duncan Clifford!"

At this there appeared upon the scene a tall, soldierly man, with a drooping blond mustache and a blue cap with gilt insignia, the city marshal, Captain Ford. He asked me a few rapid questions, which I thought very intelligent, and then, asking me to remain beside the body, he departed. He was gone perhaps five minutes, and nothing of consequence happened in my observation during his absence, but I had a great surprise when he returned, for he brought with him the milliner, whom I instantly recognized as a young woman named Esther Warren. She had been employed in my office up to four months ago, when she had given up her position.

Before we could exchange a word, even of ordinary greeting, the marshal detached us from the inclosure thrown and drove us gently before him at the back of the store.

"Now," said he, turning to me, "you two people know each other. I saw that at a glance. Who are you?"

"Who am I?" asked the young woman.

"Yes," said he. "You are supposed to be Mrs. Wilson. No one in this town knows anything about you. Where did you come from? Where is Mr. Wilson, and where is he? Where did you get the money with which you opened this store?"

"I decline to answer these questions," she said.

"So I supposed," said he without a trace of annoyance. "That's why I asked them all at once. But you don't deny that Clifford had been calling on you and was taken sick up there?"

"No, I don't deny it."

"Did you give him anything to eat or drink?"

"No."

As she made this reply my memory flashed at once to the glimpse of her that I had had at the window, but even without the sight of the wine glass I should have known that she was not telling the truth.

"Did he say what seemed to be the matter with him?"

"Yes; he was faint. He thought it was the cigar that he was smoking. He said his lips felt numb."

"I thought they looked queer," said Ford. "Here's the cigar," showing us half of a very small one. "I found it in his pocket. He was going to have it examined, I suppose. Well, I'll do that, but it's poisoned sure enough. Now," he continued, pointing his finger at the girl, "to whose advantage is this man's death—to whose advantage?"

"I beg your pardon," said I. "Is this young lady under arrest?"

At this moment a hasty hand was laid upon the knob of the door which communicated with the shop.

"You can't come in," said the marshal, but he was mistaken. The lock of the door burst with a rattle of splinters, and Frank Clifford precipitated himself into the room.

"Can't come in, eh?" said he. "What do you think about it now?"

He strode across to the little milliner and, standing beside her, glared at the marshal, who had not risen from his chair or even paused in caressing his silky mustache.

"Glad to see you, Mr. Clifford," said he, speaking through his hand. "Have a seat and tell us where you got this cigar that you gave to your uncle."

Before he could reply the young woman stepped in front of him, and she was a picture. I had always thought her beautiful, but in a somewhat tepid style. She was quite a different creature now.

"Mr. Clifford—Mr. Duncan Clifford—got that cigar here in this store," she cried. "He told me so."

The marshal rose and stepped to the broken door, now guarded on the outside by some serviceable citizen who had appointed himself deputy.

"Send Edgeworth in here," said the marshal, but it appeared that the tobacconist-jeweler was not present. No one knew what had become of him.

"Ah, he told you so!" said the marshal, turning to the milliner and calmly resuming the conversation. "How did he happen to do that?"

"I don't remember," she answered, "but if the cigar was poisoned I know why. Mr. Edgeworth has annoyed me beyond endurance with his attentions. He knew that Mr. Duncan Clifford came to see me often. He believed that I preferred Mr. Clifford, and he hated him insanely."

"So Mr. Clifford used to come to see you? Why?"

"To persuade me to go away," was the reply. "He offered me money. He was trying to separate me from Frank."

"To give up Frank?" said the marshal. "What are you to him?"

"I am his wife," she answered, "but Mr. Clifford did not know it."

"And if he had known it Frank might have lost half a million dollars, I see."

The entrance of Mr. Edgeworth interrupted this line of questioning.

"Ah, Edgeworth; good evening," said the marshal.

"Good evening, Captain Ford," responded the tobacconist in a deep, heavy voice that sounded strange from his narrow chest and thin lips.

"When did you sell this cigar to Duncan Clifford?" asked Ford.

The tobacconist took the half consumed cigar and examined it in the manner of an expert.

"I never carried these goods," he said. "It's a sort of large tobacco cigarette, sold eight in a box—a little tin box. I think they're called the Marquis."

The marshal turned to Frank.

"Give me your cigar case or whatever you carry them in," said he.

"You have no authority," Frank began.

"Haven't I?" retorted Ford, drawing a revolver. "You are under arrest. We'll search you at the station, and I know what we'll find."

"Wait one moment," said Frank, with more calmness than I should have expected of so excitable a man. "I will admit that I gave that cigar to my uncle after dinner and another like it this evening. I do not believe that it is poisoned. Of course it isn't. I had nothing to do with this crime, if it is a crime, and"—

"I gave him wine in my room," cried Esther, panic stricken with fear for the man she loved. "The bottle has been uncorked, where any one—this man"— She finished the sentence by a wild gesture toward Edgeworth.

"Clifford was ill before you gave him the wine," said the marshal. "Tell us so, and you were ill, too. Sit down, all of you."

Presently a man, red faced and breathless, burst into the room.

"He went home and changed his clothes!" cried this fellow. "His other clothes were all wet. I found 'em."

The marshal turned slowly to Mr. Edgeworth.

"I missed you," said he. "It seemed queer. So I sent this man to see about it. How did your other suit of clothes get wet?"

There was a long moment of silence; then Edgeworth sprang at the marshal as quick as a flash. Ford turned for a clinch and half rose, but Edgeworth dodged and flung himself against a small table on which were the marshal's revolver and a lamp that was the only light of the room. There was a great crash and then darkness, with the noise of an indiscriminate struggle. Ford, his messenger, Frank and myself were all in a grapple, while Edgeworth, the object of our efforts, eluded us in the room, which he knew better than we did, and escaped by a stairway to a loft, from a window of which he dropped into the yard. But why had he fled?

The clew that helped us was the wet clothes, for they suggested the canal. We got lanterns and went out through the yard at the rear of Edgeworth's store and came to the canal's bank. There was about half an inch of ice on the water, but at one point it was broken for a distance of ten feet outward, as if some one had plunged in. A suicidal attempt? Then why had the man come out again?

The riddle was not read until the next day, when a thorough examination of this spot resulted in bringing up from the bottom of the canal a metal cigar cutter such as one sees upon tobacconists' counters. The cigar is inserted into a little trap, and a knife blade, actuated by a spring, cuts off the end.

To this common contrivance Edgeworth had added a sort of syringe which his skill with tools enabled him to make in a manner that I am tempted to call admirable. This syringe injected into the cigar a sufficient quantity of a tasteless, deadly poison. Edgeworth had doubtless kept this machine for many days, waiting for Clifford to come to his store alone. Doubtless also he bided the time when Clifford should be lighting one of his own cigars bought in some other place.

The occasion served him well on this particular evening. Clifford had finished one of his nephew's little cigars and was about to light the other when he came abreast of Edgeworth's store on his way to see the milliner. No one else was present. The fatal contrivance was cleverly put in the right place, and the victim's death resulted in the manner described.

Esther's loud cry reached Edgeworth's ears, and he guessed its meaning. Momentarily panic stricken, he ran to throw the cigar cutter into the canal, but the ice was much thicker than he supposed, and it upheld the fatal evidence for all men's sight. Edgeworth tried to crawl out on the ice and crashed through. He succeeded in sinking the box and regaining the shore, but he dared not show himself in his wet clothes, so he ran home and changed them and hazarded a return.

This we conjectured, and Edgeworth's confession confirmed it. He was captured a week later in a hospital in Wilmington, Del., where he died of pneumonia, resulting perhaps from his wetting in the canal.

From Frank Clifford I obtained the remainder of the story. Unknown to me, he had fallen in love with Miss Warren and secretly married her. Then, with some wild idea of permitting her charms and virtues to be known in Branford and thus winning his uncle's consent to the marriage, he had bought the little millinery store for her. But Uncle Duncan proved a hard man to win over. He guessed a part of the secret and would not hear of an alliance with "Mrs. Wilson." In this state of affairs the foolish young lovers decided to confess to me and seek my advice, and that was the reason why I was summoned to Branford in time to behold the catastrophe.

Duncan Clifford died without a will. His death gave Frank control of his own property that had been in trust and also nearly all of his uncle's large fortune.

Brother Gardner's General Remarks

Clingstone Johnson of Soul Caraliny Comes In For a Raking at the Limekiln Club.

[Copyright, 1906, by P. C. Eastment.]

WHEN the Limekiln club had finished the regular order of business at its last meeting, Brother Gardner arose with a very serious expression of countenance, and after a long look up and down the hall he said:

"Gem'len of dis club, I feel it my dooty to make a few general remarks dis eavenin' on a subjick dat consarns us all. 'Bout fo' weeks ago de Hon. Clingstone Johnson of Soul Caraliny, arrove yere to make a speech befo' dis club. I didn't zactly like de looks of de man. He was too long in de back of de neck and too short in de legs. His eyes was too clus together and his mouf too fur apart. He had de appetite of a hoss while claimin' to hev de sentiment of a poet.

"All of you will remember dat speech. It had to do wid de rights of man, and it appeared to make out dat

"DIS CLIMATE AM TOO COLD FUR HIM"

one man was jest as good as another, no matter what his color, condition or de length of his heels. Instead of gwine back home arter makin' dat speech de Hon. Clingstone decided to hang around fur a spell, and he's hangin' yit. If Bradders Giveadam Jones and Samuel Shin want to take a free boarder into deir cabins, I hev no objections, but de time has arrove when I also wanter say somethin' 'bout de rights of man.

"It has pained and grieved me to observe de effects of dat speech. Feelin' dat he was as good as any other man on airth, Waydown Bebee has put a mortgage on his mewl to buy hisself a fifteen dollar dress coat.

"Six weeks ago Elder Penstock was satisfied to drink cold water and lib mostly on puddin' and milk. Yesterday he was onderin' in a case of beer and a gallon of ice cream.

"A few days ago Pickles Smith would hev climbed ober de fence to make room fur a white man to pass, but today he wants all de road fur hisself and am wishin' dat some white man would jest try to crowd him de least bit.

"I notice a swagger in de gait of Nicodemus White and a surprisin' air of independence in de way Judge Carter walks into a grocery and inquires de price of pineapples.

"Three weeks ago State Rights Henderson thought a pa'r of cowhide shoes good nuff fur him. He appears yere dis eavenin' wearin' patent leathers dat cost fo' dollars, and instead of walkin' five blocks on foot he took de street kyar.

"Two months ago Jubilashun Scott was so humble dat he dasn't assert dat Columbus diskivered America, but dis arternoon he was swellin' around town and offerin' to lick any man who denied dat Noah's ark was painted blue.

"Up to a few days ago any member of dis club ridin' on a street kyar would hev bin ashamed to keep his seat while a woman of any color stood up. Three eavenin's ago I saw Washington Blair, Judas Brown and Telegraph Jones hangin' right to der seats like grim death, while fo' women was hangin' to de straps. When dey was spoke to by a white man who had gin up his seat long befo', dey sassed him back.

"I see a change in Watermillyon Carter, Emancipation Hardee and Previously Green, and I see it in Kurnel Cabiff, Sundown Jackson and Comealong Harper. Humble Black am no longer humble, and Retirin' Davis isn't on de retire any mo'.

"In his speech befo' dis club de Hon. Clingstone was fool nuff to declar' dat de Lawd dun created all men ekal and meant dat one man should hev jest as much as another. Yo' hev evidently been asses nuff to believe him and am actin' accordingly. If somebody dun told yo' dat all hosses was created ekal and dat de scrub hoss was jest as good as de race hoss, yo'd laugh at him.

"Samuel Shin am a breeder and dealer in dawgs. He's got curs and poodles and setters and terriers fur sale. He'll sell yo' a cur dawg fur a dollar or two, but when yo' want a collie or a greyhound yo' hev got to come down wid $25. Why? If all men and all dawgs am created ekal, why should one cost more dan another?

"Yo' kin go down to de auction places and buy a work horse fur fo'ty dollars, but if yo' dun want a race hoss yo' may hev to pay thousands. If one hoss am de same as another, how does dis come about? Yo' jest put it down in black and white dat dar's about fo'teen different sorts of men in dis world and dat when a one X man gits de idea dat he's as good as a three X man he's shoely treadin' trubble fur himself.

"De Hon. Clingstone gibs us to understand dat one man has jest as much right to de world's goods as another an' none of yo' are fools nuff to believe him. De only right dat yo' or any other livin' man has got is a chance to airn yo'r way, an' yo' can't even git dat.

"Let yo' kin git a few dollars ahead an' make dem few dollars bring yo' in a few dollars mo', dat's all right, but yo' jest dun keep yo'r hands off de basket of cokernuts in front of de grocery. Yo' may argy dat dey belong to yo' as much as to de grocer, but in dree months in jail yo' will probably see de difference.

"People am gwine around every day an' sayin' dat no man has a right to be worf a millyon dollars while another man wants fur bread. Dar hain't no question of right or wrong 'bout it. One man will git ahead of another in money makin', an' yo' can't help it. Yo' might as well say dat one hoss has no bizness to gallop in under de wire while another am foolin' away his time on de backstretch.

"No man was ever yit bo'n into dis world who didn't have a show to git along. Mebbe he has to begin life in a sawmill, but it depends upon hisself how long he stays dar. Yo' will find mighty few o' de rich men of today who wasn't as pore as skim milk when dey started out in life. If dey hev hustled and worked hard and been cute and forced luck, why should we be down on 'em?

"When yo' find a pusson arguin' dat all property orter be divided up, yo' jest trace him back and yo'll find dat he has sot on de fence thirty days fur ebery day he's worked. He aches to git sumthin fur nuthin. He wants some one else to climb de tree fur de chestnuts.

"I reckon yo'll find de Hon. Clingstone to be a man of dis sort. In de spring, while other folks am plantin' yams and watermillyons, he's shootin' craps or sleepin' in de sun. When summer comes and de yams and watermillyons are ripe, he's ready to argy dat one man has no bizness to hev a hundred millyons while another has none.

"Yo' want to understand dat a man am what he am. He's hisself and nobody else. De Lawd didn't dun put him yere to be great or small, rich or pore. It's all left to hisself as to what he shall become. Yo' must gib him half de road, and he must do de same by yo'. De man who gits it into his head dat bekase he happens to be bo'n he's at de top ob de heap is half fool. I hev dis eavenin' sent word to de Hon. Clingstone dat dis climate am too cold fur him and dat he'd better pack up his bundle and move on. It's none ob my bizness what he may say to yo' as individuals, but when I find his doctrines brung into dis Limekiln club as the things to sw'ar by it becums my dooty to move in de matter.

"At our last meetin' I accidentally left fo' lemons on my desk. Some of yo' who believe dat all property should be divided up hev divided dose lemons. Not only dat, but yo didn't even leave de seeds fur me. Dat's 'bout de way sich ideas work out.

"I am told dat Giveadam Jones was swaggerin' around a day or two ago and declarin' dat he was jest as good a man as de next and dat if he had his rights he would also own a cabin. As for his bein' as good as I am, we won't waste any breath disputin', but I want to make it mighty plain to him and to all de res' of yo' dat yo'r theories want to stop right dar. If any of yo' go on to argy dat de taters and pumpkins and squashes and onions in my cellar am his jest as much as mine, yo'll git sich a dose of bird shot dat yo'll linger in bed for three months arterward. Let us now break de meetin' in two and go home."

M. QUAD.

On the Job.

At a recent public meeting of retiring councilors in a certain ward in a country town one of the speakers was boasting that he could bring an argument to a "p'int" as quick as any other man.

On hearing this one of the audience who was acquainted with the speaker shouted out, "Aye, man, Sandy, and ye can bring a quart tae a pint a guid bit quicker."—London Tit-Bits.

Company.

Curious 'bout my Uncle Jim.
Trouble kind o' clung to him;
Had most every kind there is
From the mumps to rheumatiz.
But he says he don't complain
'Bout the bother nor the pain;
Says that trouble's got to be Kind o' sort o' company.

Says that he kin allus find
Subjects to divert his mind;
Never feels the slightest doubt
As to what he'll talk about;
Remedies must be applied.
An' that keeps him occupied.

LOOK FOR THE LEAKS.

Assistant Postmaster General Madden, if he will look into the workings of the postoffice department a little, may find a number of remedies available to cure the postal deficit preferable to his expedient of raising the rate of postage on printed matter (second class) from $20 to $80 per ton. The Post has called attention to the fact that the express companies solicit the business of hauling newspapers at a lower rate than the postoffice realizes for the same service. The discrepancy between income and expenditure in the postoffice department does not come from any loss in handling second class matter at $20 a ton.

Apparently the department has no means of determining what parts of its business are profitable and what are not. The system of book-keeping does not enable the postmaster general to know whether a particular branch of the service is paying expenses or not. The alleged loss in handling second class matter is a mere guess on the part of somebody whose estimate may easily be influenced by a desire to protect and prolong the existing graft-tainted contracts of the railroads with the department.

Almost any printer who has been invited to furnish stamped envelopes, containing a printed business card, could suggest one very probable place to look for a leak in the business of the postoffice department. These envelopes are furnished by Uncle Sam ready printed at a rate which hardly covers the cost of the paper as the ordinary printer buys it. Then too, the government sends this merchandise through the mails free of charge, while the printer has to pay expressage or freight on his stock coming or going.

It may be worth while for the department to do this printing for nothing or below cost in order to increase the sale of its stamps, but these sources of loss and apparent deficit should not all be charged up to the business of carrying newspapers.

That business, at $20 a ton, should yield a good profit under any reasonable contract with the railroads. Let the department give the committee of congress figures showing how much the government makes or loses per thousand on printed stamped envelopes. Let a statement be made, too, showing how many tons per year of this class of merchandise is sent free through the mails to all parts of the country. Such a statement would help to run down the sources of that postal deficit. The more the matter is looked into, the less reasonable it will appear to charge that deficit up to the newspapers and raise the postal rate on their product fourfold. The rate of $20 a ton for carrying newspapers in the mails is high enough. Let Mr. Madden look for the leaks elsewhere.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

The McCumber Service Pension bill, so called, which passed the senate on Friday, might be more accurately described as an age pension bill for veterans. Twenty years ago such a measure would have been vigorously opposed but today it receives unanimous support in the upper house of Congress, and no sharp hostility is likely to be manifested in any part of the country. The explanation is simple. We have reached a point of time when all the survivors of the Mexican War and nearly all the survivors of the Civil War have have passed the limit of disputable disability. We have already established by executive order and legislation a system of age pensions, and the McCumber bill extends that system only a little further. Under President Roosevelt's executive order of March 15, 1904, the pension examiners were directed "to consider as evidential fact, if the contrary does not appear, that when a claimant has passed the age of sixty-two he is disabled one-half in ability to perform manual labor and is entitled to be rated at $6 month." It was further provided that after sixty-five the rates should be $8 a month, after sixty-eight $10 a month and after seventy $12 a month—the full rate for disability proved by medical examination. The Pension Appropriation act of April 24, 1906, directed that the rebuttable presumption established by the President's order be accepted as final and absolute.

Mr. McCumber's measure goes further in admitting completing disability to perform manual labor at sixty-two abolishing all grading between sixty-two and seventy. A veteran pensioned on an age claim under the present law would received a little less than $8 a month for the eight year period between sixty-two and seventy. Under the proposed act he would receive the flat $12 rate. After seventy and up to seventy-five he would receive $15 instead of $12, and after seventy-five $20 stead of $12. It is impossible to guess how much this change of rates would cost the government. One estimate is $15,000,000 a year. But this seems excessive, for it is difficult to say how many of the possible beneficiaries under the new law would take advantage of its provisions. When President Roosevelt's order was issued in 1904 some heated imaginations figured its certain cost at $10,000,000 to $20,000,000. As a matter of fact the order caused no perceptible increase in pension exyenditures. The veterans now on the roll who will be enabled to draw increased compensation under it cannot survive on the average more than a few years, and it may be argued that the government can well afford this small additional recompense to its defenders in their advancing years. It must be remembered, too, that the cost of living has materially increased and that $12 goes little further today than $8 did ten years ago.

GOV. DAWSON of West Virginia is doubtful whether the exportation of natural gas from that state can be legally prohibited. Why should it any more be possible to prohibit the farmers of that state from disposing of the natural gas under their farms in the open markets of the world than it would be possible to prohibit them from disposing of their coal in the same way?

TILLMAN AND ROOSEVELT.

It must have been a sore surprise to Senator Tillman to have his own record unearthed in the matter of discharging troops without honor, at a time when he is so busily engaged in condemning President Roosevelt.

The aforesaid history in to the effect that Senator Tillman, then governor of South Carolina, in April, 1894, did the very same thing for which he is now condemning the President—discharged troops without honor, trial or redress.

It was during the Darlington war, leading citizen of that town and other citizens made these constables flee for their lives.

Ordered to seizsd the two telegraph offices in Columbia and to intercept and read all messages in either direction, the Newberry Rifles performed the service for one night, when the company, officers and men, resigned in a body.

Instead of accepting their resignation, Governor Tillman ordered them dismissed from the service as men unworthy to wear its uniforms all because they refused to spy upon the private affairs of citizens.

These were white troops who had committed no murder or other felonious crime, and yet when a band of midnight negro assassins break forth, killing and maiming innocent and law abiding citizens, in which crimes they are protected by their fellow soldiers, forsooth, South Carolina's "professional hell-raiser" comes forward with condemnations of a punishment that if anything, was only too mild.—Atlanta Constitution.

HANCOCK IS SWEPT BY FLAMES.

An Early Morning Conflagration That Threatens the Town With Destruction.

A message came from Hancock early this morning that the town was burning and that help was needed. The fire started in the roof of the store occupied by Matthew H. Hughes, in the Carl block, opposite the historic Barton House. All of the Carl block was burned. It adjoins the old Hancock Bank and includes the store of Reuben Conn and the storeroom lately occupied by Dr. J. A. West & Co., druggists. The Carl block is composed of three storerooms. It was of frame, two stories. The families of Mr. Hughes and Mr. Conn live over their stores. Hancock has no fire protection. The roof of the building was of metal and was red hot before the volunteers could reach it. The intense heat drove them away.

WILL WE HAVE A LATE SPRING

Phophets Say Backward Spring Usually Follows a Mild Winter.

That there will be a late spring is the opinion of one, who, during fifty years of the study of the habits of creatures of wood and field, has been a close weather observer as well and is familiar with all the signs that aid the prognosticator.

"An open winter such as this has been," he says, "is certain to be followed by a late and backward spring.

"Thus far there have been few snow storms and no protracted cold snaps. There has been no heavy ice on rivers or creeks. This means that the cold weather will come in March and April and may extend into May. As a consequence, planting of crops will be delayed.

"I doubt whether there will be thick ice cut this year. When there is no heavy ice before Christmas, the freeze-ups thereafter are usually of short duration and not sufficient to produce thick ice. The prospect for the iee dealers who depend on the natural crop is not bright.

"The winter of fifty years ago was an open one. Streams were open during and after the Christmas holidays. There was no ice cut till March, and then the ice harvested was not more than three inches thick. That year spring was late. There were cold rains, light snows and other disagreeable conditions in April and the early days of May were cold. So it has been with all the open witers we have had since. When there are mild conditions in the autumn and these continue through mid-winter, then look for a late spring.

"Last fall there were many signs of nature to indicate an open winter. Many of the migratory birds were late in leaving for their winter haunts in the South. Robins and blackbirds have been here all winter.

"It is hardly likely that there will be much if any rigorous weather between now and May, but March and April may have enough disagreeable weather."—Philadelphia Press.

MARYLAND LED OTHER STATES

State's First Legislature Was Far Ahead of the Times.

State Superintendent of Education M. Bates Stephens has selected as the topic for study in the schools on Maryland Day—March 25—the beginning of popular government in Maryland, with a review of the early Legislature.

In the selection of the topic, Dr. Stephens could hardly have decided upon a more interesting subject or presented a more fruitful field for historical research. While the Virginia Assembly initiated government by the people in the New World in 1619, yet to the sturdy English settlers of Maryland is due the credit of bringing to life an independent legislative body of the people far in advance of their times, just as the Maryland Religious Toleration Act was far ahead of the prevailing civilization of the Old World.

The original charter of Maryland from Charles I was intended for George Calvert, first Lord Baltimore, who died before it was issued, but the great document was delivered to his son, Cecelius Calvert, second Lord Baltimore. The proprietor reserved to himself the right to frame laws for the government of the province. It was provided that such laws should be approved by the people, except in cases of emergency, when the authority vested in the Lord Proprietary was almost absolute.

Under the provisions of the charter the freemen of the province were convened at St. Mary's in the early part of 1635. Little is known of the legislation of the body, the records having been destroyed. Lord Baltimore was still in England fostering emigration, when he received certain laws which had been enacted by the people and sent to him for his approval. As this was a reversal of the provisions of the charter, Lord Baltimore vetoed the laws. He set to work to frame a complete code for the government of the province and directed that the Legislature be convened January 25, 1638.

When the Legislature met at that time the laws digested by Calvert were presented to it for its approval in place of those which he vetoed. But the people, determined that the time to strike for absolute freedom had arrived, charter or no charter, Lord Baltimore's code was rejected in its entirety, and the Legislature began to frame its own system of laws.

Forty-one bills were adopted by this Legislature, and Calvert, acting under the authority of the charter, vetoed them all. The controversy was not long. Calvert was too wise and just a man to permit a point like this to interfere with the prosperity and welfare of the Marylanders, and he concluded that his power to veto any bill of which he disapproved was sufficient to protect his rights, so he gracefully submitted to the will of the people.

The laws enacted by Maryland's first Legislature shows that this body possessed a remarkable adaptability for judicious legislation and speaks volumes for the inherent quality of "home rule" of the first settlers of Maryland.

PENSIONS FOR ALL VETERANS

Interesting Paper on the Subject Prepared By Mr. Jacob Brown.

Considerable interest is being felt, by the old soldiers, and others, in the pension bill lately passed by the United States Senate. Many of them are inquiring and are anxious to know its provisions, and whom it will benefit. I propose to furnish this paper such light on the subject as I may possess. It is not a law, and cannot be, till it passes the House, and receives the President's approval, which it is very likely to receive before Congress adjourns.

The bill is confined to the soldiers of our Civil War, and does not provide for new or orignal claims. It seems to be confined entirely to the increase of pensions of the old soldiers and marines of the Civil and Mexican Wars, who served 90 days or more, and were honorably discharged. Nearly all of these soldiers and seamen are now drawing pensions under the different acts of Congress, especially the act of 1890; and some under the age rule, so called. No pensioner now receives less than $6 per month nor more than $12 under the act of 1890. Under the old general laws, the $12 limit does not apply in cases where the disabilities justify, and were incurred in the service. The age rule, and law as now in practice allows a pension of $6 at the age of 62 years, $8 at the age of 65, $10 at the age of 68 and $12 at the age of 70. There are a considerable number of pensioners between the ages of 62 and 70 years according to the scale. The bill mentioned will put all the intermediate soldiers up to $12, and those who are actually 70 or over, $15, and $20 for those who have reached the 75 mark.

As already stated this proposed law will not add anything to the pension rolls as original or new pensioners, but still by way of increased pensions will enlarge the pension appropriations. The increase has been estimated at about $7,000,000. But this will be largely offset by the deaths of pensioners which are increasing with the passing years. It should be noted that the bill makes no reference to widows, dependent parents, or relatives. It is confined to living soldiers.

There are different pension rolls, the most extensive one is the soldiers of the Civil War. Something over 1,120,000 pension certificates have been issued since the first pension law of 1862, for soldiers who served in the army. The navy list is a seperate one and and contains about 27,000 who served in the navy. The widows roll numbers a little over 619,000. I cannot tell just how many of these large rolls are yet living—not over one half. The annual appropriations for the pensions have been about $140,000,000 for several years.

It can be further stated that the soldier list of pensioners in the names of a number of soldiers in the Spanish War, also such in the regular army, as incurdisabilities in the service (though in time of peace) as unfit them for manual labor. J. B.

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

LOCAL AND OTHERWISE.

Incidents and Events at Home and Abroad—Personal Mention, Etc.

Mr. Austin Brown has been ill several days with an attack of pleurisy.

Mr N. U. Bond and Miss Elizabeth Bond were guests Tuesday and yesterday of friends in Oakland.

Mr. Frank Browning, one of the B. & O.'s firemen, spent Tuesday night in Oakland with his parents.

Mr. William Welch, of Morgantown, West Va., is the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Austin Brown, at their home in Oakland.

Mr. F. E. Rathbun, assistant principal of the Oakland schools, has been quite ill all of this week with an attack of quinsy.

Mrs. Benj. H. Sincell and daughter Mary went to Kingwood yesterday afternoon to remain a few days as the guests of relatives.

Mrs. Alice Offutt, of Cumberland, is in Oakland visiting her sister, Mrs. Daniel E. Offutt, having arrived here on Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Gus A. Bolden, of Grafton, was in Oakland last Saturday when he make this office a fraturnal visit. He returned home Sunday afternoon.

Mrs. Adair and daughter Miss Mattie Adair, of Terra Alta, who visited Mr. and Mrs. King Delawer, returned to their home Saturday morning.

Dr. W. W. Davis, of the Park, was in Oakland Tuesday on business, going from here to an eastern point in the interest of the Park Association.

James Frantz, of near Selbysport, came up to Oakland Tuesday morning to assist in the management of the Frantz Hotel during his father's illness.

Mrs. D. A. Vaughn and two sons Harry and Ray, left Oakland Monday morning for Connellsville, Pa., where they will be guests of relatives a week or two.

Mrs. J. Wilson Humbird, of Cumberland, arrived in Oakland last Saturday afternoon to visit her son, in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. W. R. Offutt, for a few days.

Mr. William Kimmell, of Thayerville, went to Grafton yesterday afternoon to attend the funeral of his brother, the late Perry E. Kimmell, which occured this afternoon at 2 o'clock.

Don't grumble if your paper is not always flushed up to the high standard of your ideal. Charitably remember that no editor is capable of getting up quite as good a paper as you could yourself.

Mr. E. J. Frantz, proprietor of the Frantz Hotel, was taken suddenly ill on last Saturday with an attack of acute indigestion, since which time he has been in a precarious condition. This morning he is slightly better.

The farmer bends the knee to none, and is less disturbed by the world-wide reign of graft and greed than any of his fellows. May he live long and prosper—this son of the soil, who is the balance wheel of the universe.

We heard a man the other day kicking for a chance to work. That man was a false alarm. No man who wants work these days need to be without employment ten hours. There is all kinds of work in this district, and good wages can be secured by good men.

Prof. Leo J. Rasche left for Pittsburg Monday morning on a pleasure trip. He will also visit Washington, Baltimore, New York and perhaps Boston during his absence, which will extend over the period of a fortnight. We wish him an enjoyable trip and safe return.—Grafton Leader.

The farmer's hair may be bushy, his skin bronzed, but his eyes are clear, his digestion is like that of a three-year-old mule, his conscience is like the ether above his head, and his bank account as fat as his favorite shoat. He is the most independent creature that wears the garb of civilized man.

There are pillows wet by sobs; there are gentle sensitive natures seared and warped; there are old time friends separated and walking their lonely ways with hope dead and memory but a pang; there are cruel misunderstandings that make life bare, these are but few of the sorrows that come from the crimes of the tongue.

Owing to a landslide along the Pittsburg Division of the Baltimore and Ohio railroad on last Saturday night all passenger trains scheduled to run over that division via Pittsburg and Cumberland, were detoured over the main line, passing through Oakland. In all more than a dozen trains ran through during the hours of Sunday.

Messrs. Joseph and George Bradley, sons of the late Mrs. Ellen Bradley, notice of whose death was published in these columns last week, the interment taking place in Cincinnati, Ohio, on Thursday, arrived in Oakland Saturday morning and will remain here a few days before returning to Baltimore, near which city they are attending school.

Mr. R. A. C Howard, of Bloomington, ex-Assemblyman from Garrett county, was in Oakland last Monday on business. Mr. Howard is engaged in traveling for a Harrisonburg (Va.) cigar manufacturer and is meeting with considerable success as a "knight of the grip." He has the well wishes of his many friends in Oakland for continued prosperity.

The damage suit of Mrs. Mary E. Blackburn vs. the County Commissioners of Garrett county, which was appealed to the Court of Appeals, will be taken up at Annapolis today, when the arguments will be made by Messrs. J. C. Renninger and A. A. Doub for the Commissioners and by Messrs. G. S. Hamill and R. T. Semmes for Mrs. Blackburn.

Messrs. John W. Hart and Joseph Helbig were at Piedmont on last Sunday where they attended the funeral of their relative, Mr. S. Paxton, who met with death a few days previous by fall-over a cliff of rock along the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio railroad at a point in Virginia. Mr. Paxton at the time of his death was employed by the C. & O. as a machinist.

One-cent postage stamps are to be issued in book form like the 2-cent stamps are now issued, according to the Third Assistant Postmaster General, who stated yesterday that preparations to that end are being made, and that the first issue will be made about March 1. The books will be of one size, containing twenty-four 1-cent stamps, in four sheets of six stamps each, interleaved with paraffin paper and bound as are the books of 2-cent stamps. They will sell for 25 cents each.

THE COLDEST SINCE 1899.

Yesterday Morning The Mercury Registered 18 Degrees Below.

The coldest weather experienced in this section of the country since the year 1899 was yesterday morning when the thermometer registered eighteen degrees below zero. This is a change of 98 degrees in the temperature since last Saturday afternoon when a thermometer exposed on the sunny side of a building on Second street registered 80 degrees.

On February 20th, 1902, the mercury registered the same as yesterday morning, 18 degrees below. Other cold days within the past eight years taken from the record made upon the dates below named by Col. A. G. Sturgiss, of Oakland, were as follows:

January 2nd, 1899, 24 degrees below: February 10th 1899, 21½ degrees below, upon which day the thermometer stood at this figure the full twenty-four hours. The following day, February 11th, the record was 20¼ degrees below.

The many friends of Mrs. Brooks Fleming will regret to learn that she is seriously ill of typhoid fever at the home of her mother, Mrs. Dudley Dryer, in Columbus, Ohio. Mrs. Fleming had gone home on a visit and was taken ill while there. Her present condition is considered alarming and much concern is felt among her relatives and friends.—Fairmont West Virginian.

Mrs. Stephen Browning, of near Oakland, accompanied by her physician, Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh, went to Baltimore last Sunday morning where Mrs. Browning will undergo a surgical operation for the removal of a cancerous growth. Mrs. Browning's condition is such as to give her relatives much concern, still they feel confident that her health will be improved by the treatment she will receive.

Mr. D. E. Offutt, who went to Baltimore last Thursday night to visit his daughter Miss Nell, who is a patient in the Maryland General Hospital in that city, returned to Oakland Saturday evening. Miss Oufftt's condition is much improved now but at the time of her father's visit she was seriously ill. Mr. Offutt was accompanied to Baltimore by Dr. Henry W. McComas, the latter returning to Oakland yesterday morning.

While the people of this immediate section of Garrett county were enjoying spring-like weather and balmy breezes on last Saturday the country to the east of us was being visited by one of the severest storms of the winter. At Piedmont, Lonaconing, Frostburg and Cumberland snow fell to a depth of from six to ten inches and sleighing was indulged in in Baltimore and Washington, while in Oakland, which is looked upon by our friends off the mountains as a place of perpetual snow and ice, blizzards and frigid weather nine or ten months in the year, furnace fires were allowed to die out and many people were uncomfortably dressed in their usual mild weather clothing.

We regret to note that the condition of Mr. Perry E. Kimmil, who is suffering with typhoid fever at the City Hispital, is very critical today, and the indications are that he is beyond all prospect of recovery. He has lingered between life and death for the past forty-eight hours. His case has been a severe one from the first, and meningitis having set in the physicians and nurses have been unable to cope with it. Dr. Cook, from Fairmont hospital, was to see the patient yesterday, but stated that every thing possible was being accomplished at the Hospital. The many friends of the young man, however, still hope for a change for the better.—Grafton Sentinel.

A girl in her teens with too many and too costly clothes on her back, gets self-conscious and vain, and loves admiration—and you grown-ups know the next step. A simple, pure-hearted girl, who has a place in a home, home work and home duties, has her heart there and no boy can steal it. Even when maturity comes and a real man comes and a real affair of her heart comes, will such a girl leave home and then only after heart rending. But a girl who is at home only at the table and in the bed won't love that home. Work makes things sacred. The child whose home memories are not haloed by work, who is not needed and does not feel the need, will not love home. And if she doesn't love the home of her girlhood she will love no other. She will go anywhere for anything. Home will mean nothing to such a woman, and if she is respectable she will only lack the opportunity to be a bad woman and is good only through circumstances or by the necessity of an ugly face. She will curse any man she marries.

Former Grafton Citizen Drowned.

Word has just been received by relatives in Grafton of the drowning of Mr. Albert L. Steele, formerly of Grafton, and a son of Mr. Charles Steele, of Grafton, by being swept off a steamer while en route from his home in Portland, Maine, to New York City, during a heavy storm off Block Island. He was to work for the national government at the coming Jamestown Exposition, and had worked in that capacity at several expositions in recent years. He was 37 years old and leaves a wife and one child.

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Program For Two Days' Session to Be Held at Oakland.

Auditorium Damaged.

The large auditorium at Mountain Lake Park, which was erected a few years ago at a cost of several thousand dollars, was considerably damaged last Friday night when a sleet-ladened tree fell upon the projecting roof, tearing away the roof timbers and shingles and making an aperature about forty feet square. The main roof of the building was not damaged and repairs can made a comparatively small cost.

Cottage Robbed.

One night last week the summer home at Mountain Lake Park of Mr. Lonny Carr, of Fairmont, was broken into and the bed rooms ransacked by the burglars who scattered bed clothing and other contents of the house through the rooms. Mr. Carr being detained at home by the illness of his wife has been unable to come to the Park to ascertain whether or not any goods has been carried off.

Grafton's Mayor Seeks Vindication In a Court.

Mayor John W. McClung, through his attorneys, at Grafton, W. Va., instituted suit against Jas. M. Litzinger, publisher of the Grafton Leader, for ten thousand dollars, for libel. This suit grows out of the alleged defamatory articles published in the Leader over the signature of "Rambler," under a number of dates some time past. The chief attorney in the case on the plaintiff's side will be attorney Chas. P. Guard, and with him will be associated several other members of the Taylor county bar.

Donates Four Acres for Park.

Kingwood, W. Va., now enjoys the distinction of being owner in fee of a public park. Hon. W. G. Brown who is a member of the town council which is now just rounding out its official duties for the fiscal year at the meeting of that body on Tuesday night delivered a deed to the town for the four acre grove just west of town, the same to be used by the town as a public park. The location is admirable and nearly the whole of the four acre tract of land given by Mr. Brown is covered with beautiful shade trees and a small cliff of rocks extends through part of it. It is a fine sight for an auditorium and will make en excellent sight for picnics and summer meetings.

Law is Unconstitutional.

The compulsory feature of the Maryland State road law, which provides that under certain conditions owners of property along any public road can require the county commissioners to macadamize it, was declared unconstitutional in the Circuit Court at Frederick Thursday by Chief Judge James McSherry, who is also chief justice of the Maryland Court of Appeals. This decision was given in a ruling upon a demurrer to mandamus proceedings to compel the commissioners of Frederick county to comply with the law. The case will be carried to the Court of Appeals.

Revival Continues.

A very interesting series of services are being held in St. Paul's M. E. church. The interest seems to increase with each service. Rev E. J. Westfall, of the Mt. Lake M. E. church, is ably assisting the pastor this week, and will preach tonight. Dr. W. W. Davis preached a very interesting sermon last night and will be present and assist during a part of next week. The singing which is led by a chorus choir of about twenty voices is a helpful feature in the meetings.

Mrs. Stephen Browning, of near Oakland, accompanied by her physician, Dr. M. C. Hinebaugh, went to Baltimore last Sunday morning where Mrs. Browning will undergo a surgical operation for the removal of a cancerous growth. Mrs. Browning's condition is such as to give her relatives much concern, still they feel confident that her health will be improved by the treatment she will receive.

Mr. D. E. Offutt, who went to Baltimore last Thursday night to visit his daughter Miss Nell, who is a patient in the Maryland General Hospital in that city, returned to Oakland Saturday evening. Miss Oufftt's condition is much improved now but at the time of her father's visit she was seriously ill. Mr. Offutt was accompanied to Baltimore by Dr. Henry W. McComas, the latter returning to Oakland yesterday morning.

While the people of this immediate section of Garrett county were enjoying spring-like weather and balmy breezes on last Saturday the country to the east of us was being visited by one of the severest storms of the winter. At Piedmont, Lonaconing, Frostburg and Cumberland snow fell to a depth of from six to ten inches and sleighing was indulged in in Baltimore and Washington, while in Oakland, which is looked upon by our friends off the mountains as a place of perpetual snow and ice, blizzards and frigid weather nine or ten months in the year, furnace fires were allowed to die out and many people were uncomfortably dressed in their usual mild weather clothing.

We regret to note that the condition of Mr. Perry E. Kimmil, who is suffering with typhoid fever at the City Hispital, is very critical today, and the indications are that he is beyond all prospect of recovery. He has lingered be tween life and death for the past forty-eight hours. His case has been a severe one from the first, and meningitis having set in the physicians and nurses have been unable to cope with it. Dr. Cook, from Fairmont hospital, was to see the patient yesterday, but stated that every thing possible was being accomplished at the Hospital. The many friends of the young man, however, still hope for a change for the better.—Grafton Sentinel.

A girl in her teens with too many and too costly clothes on her back, gets self-conscious and vain, and loves admiration—and you grown-ups know the next step. A simple, pure-hearted girl, who has a place in a home, home work and home duties, has her heart there and no boy can steal it. Even when maturity comes and a real man comes and a real affair of her heart comes, will such a girl leave home and then only after heart rending. But a girl who is at home only at the table and in the bed won't love that home. Work makes things sacred. The child whose home memories are not haloed by work, who is not needed and does not feel the need, will not love home. And if she doesn't love the home of her girlhood she will love no other. She will go anywhere for anything. Home will mean nothing to such a woman, and if she is respectable she will only lack the opportunity to be a bad woman and is good only through circumstances or by the necessity of an ugly face. She will curse any man she marries.

Former Grafton Citizen Drowned.

Word has just been received by relatives in Grafton of the drowning of Mr. Albert L. Steele, formerly of Grafton, and a son of Mr. Charles Steele, of Grafton, by being swept off a steamer while en route from his home in Portland, Maine, to New York City, during a heavy storm off Block Island. He was to work for the national government at the coming Jamestown Exposition, and had worked in that capacity at several expositions in recent years. He was 37 years old and leaves a wife and one child.

TEACHERS' INSTITUTE.

Program For Two Days' Session to Be Held at Oakland.

Following is the program of the local institute to be held in the Oakland High School room on Friday and Saturday, the 1st and 2nd of February. The patrons of the schools and all interested in public school work are cordially invitedto attend all exercises.

Auditorium Damaged.

The large auditorium at Mountain Lake Park, which was erected a few years ago at a cost of several thousand dollars, was considerably damaged last Friday night when a sleet-ladened tree fell upon the projecting roof, tearing away the roof timbers and shingles and making an aperature about forty feet square. The main roof of the building was not damaged and repairs can made a comparatively small cost.

Cottage Robbed.

One night last week the summer home at Mountain Lake Park of Mr. Lonny Carr, of Fairmont, was broken into and the bed rooms ransacked by the burglars who scattered bed clothing and other contents of the house through the rooms. Mr. Carr being detained at home by the illness of his wife has been unable to come to the Park to ascertain whether or not any goods has been carried off.

Grafton's Mayor Seeks Vindication In a Court.

Mayor John W. McClung, through his attorneys, at Grafton, W. Va., instituted suit against Jas. M. Litzinger, publisher of the Grafton Leader, for ten thousand dollars, for libel. This suit grows out of the alleged defamatory articles published in the Leader over the signature of "Rambler," under a number of dates some time past. The chief attorney in the case on the plaintiff's side will be attorney Chas. P. Guard, and with him will be associated several other members of the Taylor county bar.

Donates Four Acres for Park.

Kingwood, W. Va., now enjoys the distinction of being owner in fee of a public park. Hon. W. G. Brown who is a member of the town council which is now just rounding out its official duties for the fiscal year at the meeting of that body on Tuesday night delivered a deed to the town for the four acre grove just west of town, the same to be used by the town as a public park. The location is admirable and nearly the whole of the four acre tract of land given by Mr. Brown is covered with beautiful shade trees and a small cliff of rocks extends through part of it. It is a fine sight for an auditorium and will make en excellent sight for picnics and summer meetings.

Law is Unconstitutional.

The compulsory feature of the Maryland State road law, which provides that under certain conditions owners of property along any public road can require the county commissioners to macadamize it, was declared unconstitutional in the Circuit Court at Frederick Thursday by Chief Judge James McSherry, who is also chief justice of the Maryland Court of Appeals. This decision was given in a ruling upon a demurrer to mandamus proceedings to compel the commissioners of Frederick county to comply with the law. The case will be carried to the Court of Appeals.

WANTED—A good boy to take out orders and make himself useful. Apply to Oakland Model Steam Bakery.

Revival Continues.

A very interesting series of services are being held in St. Paul's M. E. church. The interest seems to increase with each service. Rev E. J. Westfall, of the Mt. Lake M. E. church, is ably assisting the pastor this week, and will preach tonight. Dr. W. W. Davis preached a very interesting sermon last night and will be present and assist during a part of next week. The singing which is led by a chorus choir of about twenty voices is a helpful feature in the meetings.

"In These Degenerate Days" an Old Time Wail

By CARROLL D. WRIGHT, Ex-United States Commissioner of Labor

ONE sees that expression, "in these degenerate days," oftener than any other in the press; one hears it oftener than any other from the pulpit. One would think that society is on the verge of ruin. Well, IT ALWAYS HAS BEEN SO. Every page in history repeats that expression about "these degenerate days" from time immemorial.

Now, in our times we are hearing about frauds, corruption growing out of rebates, postoffice scandals, insurance difficulties. We think the United States is about the worst nation on earth. We forget the conditions of OTHER NATIONS. We don't know well enough the conditions of other times. The real menace to society is the pessimism of the time that sees NO GOOD IN ANYTHING.

We welcome the work of the muck rake writer who can bring things to the surface truthfully. It is because the public conscience IS NOW MORE SENSITIVE than at any other time that we applaud successful attempts along this line. The trouble is, however, that we look at things with inverted vision, and we do not recognize the true perspective. In looking at the corruption of the past it recedes with time, and our judgment is warped BY THE PERSPECTIVE.

It is as if we were looking at things through the wrong end of a field glass. Statistics have helped to warp our judgment. We are all the time comparing our immensely more perfect statistics with the very crude and IMPERFECT STATISTICS OF THE PAST, and our comparisons are as badly warped as the statistics. For instance, using the bare figures of past and present criminal statistics, one would judge at once that crime is on the increase. A really SCIENTIFIC use of the statistics, however, taking into account how imperfectly we know of the crimes of the past, shows that the opposite conclusion is the proper one.

The late Senator Hoar in his "Autobiography of Seventy Years" speaks of telling General Garfield, after the Belknap impeachment trial in 1877, that after having looked into the history of the first sixteen years of the government he believed that there had been more corruption then than there had been under President Grant. That sort of study led Senator Hoar to say two or three years before his death, "The world is better today than it was yesterday, and it will be better TOMORROW than it is today."

ALL THE FACTS POINT TO THE TRUTH OF THAT STATEMENT, AND I SUBSCRIBE TO IT. A COMMUNITY OF CRIMINALS WOULD NOT RECOGNIZE CRIME OR SEEK TO PUNISH IT.

Why Trusts Are Possible

By William J. GAYNOR, Justice of New York Supreme Court

A TRUST is a partnership or combination of competing corporations. By such partnership or combination COMPETITION IS DESTROYED. This is the meaning of the word in the public mind as applied to aggregations of commercial capital. Such combinations are at first made by means of TRUSTEES, and that is how they came to be called trusts.

If these commercial trusts are an evil to the community in that by getting control of an industry they are able, at all events between two certain automatically fixed economic points, to raise at will the price of their product to the consumer and, on the other hand, lower the price they pay TO THE PRODUCERS OF THE RAW MATERIAL they use, if they do not become such producer themselves, who is responsible for them?

Copyright, 1901, by J. E. Purdy.

Some thoughtlessly say they are a NATURAL evolution. They are not. They exist by virtue of statutes which have been passed, and COULD NOT EXIST WITHOUT THEM. If statutes had not been passed enabling corporations to be formed to acquire and vote on the stock of OTHER CORPORATIONS, these combinations or partnerships of corporations could not have been formed and would not exist.

IF THERE BE BLAME WE ARE OURSELVES TO BLAME.

American Navy Has Not Enough of Anything

By Rear Admiral ROBLEY D. EVANS, U. S. N.

AT the present time we have nothing more than a respectable NUCLEUS for a navy to adequately represent the United States. It is not my business to criticise congress, but it sometimes puzzles us of the navy to know what congress is driving at. Frankly, WE HAVEN'T SHIPS ENOUGH. We haven't guns enough. In fact, we have not a spare gun to put on one of the ships tomorrow in case one of the guns now in use should become disabled. In addition to all this, we haven't officers enough, and there are not HALF ENOUGH OFFICERS on any of the ships.

WE HAVEN'T MEN ENOUGH, BUT WHAT WE HAVE ARE THE BEST IN THE WORLD.

It is the hope of all those connected with the navy that the next congress will do SOMETHING to better the naval service.

"Beware of False Prophets"

By GEORGE F. BAER, President of the Reading Railway

THE present tendency is to lend itching ears to STRANGE DOCTRINES. The general education of all the people, which must necessarily be limited, creates rash and SUPERFICIAL THINKING and unrest. It is true at times that a little learning is a dangerous thing. From the seats of the mighty and from the street corners where blatherskites harangue the multitude a wail of woe is heard. Everything is wrong. The whole order of our industrial and social life is assailed in vehement and hysterical appeals to the passions AND SELFISHNESS of men.

SO I SAY THAT IN OUR DAY WE NEED TO HEED THE INJUNCTION, "BEWARE OF FALSE PROPHETS."

An Awful Come Down For the Millionaire

HE rode up to his $2,000,000 residence, alighted from his $50,000 automobile, took out his $100 cigar case and lighted a weed that cost a dollar at wholesale.

After he had flecked an ash from his $100 suit, he adjusted his ten dollar necktie, gazed thoughtfully for a moment at his fifteen dollar shoes and then turned his face toward the $75,000 fountain in his front yard.

Finally he entered the gate, which was put up at a cost of $20,000, stopped a moment to admire the $50,000 worth of statuary standing on the grounds, and he was about to mount the steps of his mansion when his feet went up into the air, his ten dollar hat flew off, and he struck the ground with a thud that could have been heard half a block away.

"And to think," he moaned as he picked himself up, "that I slipped on the peeling of a banana that only cost about a cent!"

Even the millionaire has his troubles.—A. B. Lewis in Judge.

A Discovery.

"There is one thing I never realized until I began to cast my bread upon the water."

"And that is?"

"How many people are out for the dough."—Philadelphia Press.

Won by Lack of a Week.

The plaintiff's barrister in the breach of promise case thought he would make life a burden to the unfortunate young man who was the unwilling defendant.

"Do you mean to say," he asked, after a number of embarrassing questions, "that after you had been absent for an entire month you did not kiss the plaintiff, to whom you were engaged to be married, when you first saw her on your return?"

"I do," responded the defendant firmly.

"Will you make that statement to the jury?"

"Certainly, if necessary."

"Do you think that they would believe you?"

"One of them would, I know."

"Ah, indeed! And why should he, pray?"

"Because he was present when I first saw her. He was at the gate when I rode up, and she stuck her head out of the second story window, and I said to her, 'How dy'e do?' and called out I'd be back to supper in half an hour. I'm no giraffe." And everybody smiled except the barrister.—Tit-Bits.

Health and Beauty Hints.

Scars can be removed by taking a sharp knife and gently scooping them out. This method was in use by the ancients.

There is nothing more displeasing and unsightly than an oily skin. For an oily skin see the Standard Oil company.

A good complexion depends almost entirely on a good circulation. If the circulation is poor, see the circulation manager.

Moist hands may be remedied by holding them in the oven.

Dandruff is especially annoying, particularly when it drops in the soup. A good remedy for dandruff is to get scalped. This will remove the dandruff.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Born In Him.

The little son of the lawyer has finished working an elaborate sum on the blackboard, and, after the usual detailed elaboration of the operation, he concludes with:

"Therefore the answer is 2,645."

"And can you prove it?" asks the teacher.

The boy looked wise.

"Prove it? Yes, ma'am. I will subpoena the entire class as witnesses, but I must request a postponement for ten days in order to prepare my defense."—New York Life.

Trouble Enough.

"I saw the doctor stop at your house this morning," said Rubring. "Any trouble?"

"Yes," replied Hardpan; "I had a great deal of trouble."

"What was the matter?"

"He wouldn't go away until I gave him $5 on account of his last year's bill."—Catholic Standard and Times.

An Apt Quotation.

"Yes," said Marryat, "I'm pretty busy these days. Getting ready for my wedding, you know."

"Ah, that's a reminder of what Washington said," remarked Hennipeck.

"What was that?"

"'In times of peace prepare for war.'"—Boston Herald.

Feathers Versus Father.

"They say that feathers tickle,"
Said little Willie Gray.
"But that ain't true, I tell you—
Not always, anyway.

"Last week ma bought a bonnet—
Paid forty plunks for it—
An' all its wavy feathers
Ain't tickled pa a bit."

—Denver Post.

OF PUBLIC FUNCTIONS

Some Things Are Essentially of a Governmental Nature.

Collecting Customs, Maintaining the Army and the Police, Are Among These, but Not Such Undertakings as the Telegraph, the Telephone, the Street Cars or Gas and Electric Lighting—True Nature of a Public Franchise.

By ARTHUR WI[illegible], President National Electric Light association.

Some things are so essentially of a governmental nature that it would be fatuous to consider them from the standpoint of private ownership. Among these are the collection of customs, the maintenance and direction of the army and navy and the police power. In others it is the end rather than the means that should be sought, and municipal and private ownership are often on equal terms without the violation of any economic principle.

The maintenance of public highways and sewers is usually a public function, but the country abounds in examples, every whit as satisfactory, of private ownership and operation. With water the importance to the community lies not in its ownership, whether public or private, but rather in its quality, quantity and price. Many of the most satisfactory waterworks of this country and Europe are owned privately.

Beyond these there is a class of public utilities which experience has shown should lie exclusively within the domain of private enterprise. The telegraph, telephone, transportation, gas and electric light undertakings offer examples. The ownership of these by the community is advocated by some on the ground that they are necessities of modern life, by others because they partake of the nature of monopoly. It does not appear that either is a sufficient reason. These are facilities and conveniences, not necessities. The latter consist of simple dwellings, food, raiment and means of warmth in winter. If our necessities are to be municipalized we should begin with the butcher, grocer, baker and coal dealer, whose percentage of profits far exceeds that of any of the corporations in the so called public service.

Monopoly—regulated monopoly—is not necessarily opposed to the public interest. It is advantageous to all to have one telephone system, that from one point all may be conveniently reached; to have one street car system with universal transfers, making unnecessary any relation between one's home and place of work; to have a single gas or electric light works, preventing the waste of small plants and organizations and securing by the larger development increased reliability and improved quality in the service.

A franchise merely permits a public service corporation to share with others the use of the streets for the delivery to its customers of the commodity it supplies—a right that is enjoyed by every other industry. The difference is merely one of method. Were electricity delivered in storage batteries and gas in tanks—conceivable ways—no franchise would be required. Instead of using horses and wagons, which blockade the streets and make street cleaning a problem, deliveries are made beneath the surface without dirt, noise or other objectionable features.

It is through the exercise of this right that we hear of the confiscation of public property. Yet the public has not parted with its title to the streets nor its right to occupy them for any purpose or in any manner it may desire. It has simply permitted a service company to become a tenant, for which, in the form of franchise and other taxes, the company pays a high rent. Substantially the city is the landlord, possessing the power of arbitrarily determining, in the form of these taxes, what rent it shall receive. And this rent lessens proportionately the individual taxation.—Moody's Magazine.

Typical Case of City Bookkeeping.

The authorities of Lakewood, O., have charged the city $55 a year for the street lights supplied by the municipal plant. After looking at their tax bills some of the citizens came to the conclusion that this sum did not represent all the cost and called in a firm of expert accountants, who ascertained that the actual annual cost per arc had been $129.56 for the seven years the plant had been in operation, although the lights had been run on the moonlight schedule. As a private company offers all night service for less than half that amount, the experiment is not regarded as a success, except by the lighting committee.

The Record

By MARGARET MUZZEY

Copyright, 1906, by P. C. Eastman.

The midsummer golf tournament was about to begin at the Maston Country club. A handsome cup had been given to the president of the club to be played for by all the members, and a crescent pin set with pearls was put up especially for the ladies by "Millionaire Miller," a rich old bachelor.

Tom Price, aged sixteen, had declined to enter for the tournament. He stood no chance of winning without a big handicap and despised that sort of victory. If he were able to play scratch like Mr. Sloan—but that contingency was too far in the future to be considered. So, holding aloof from competition, Tom felt entitled to indulge in disinterested criticism. Joe Smith, instructor for the club, was his chosen confidant.

"Mr.—Mr. Sloan ought to get the cup. He—he has bo-bogied the course twice," stuttered Tom.

"He is a crackerjack," said Joe.

"Who goes around with Mi-Miss Benson—I mean to ve-verify her score?"

"I'd send Mr. Sloan if he were not playing himself," said Joe, with a wink.

"He—he wouldn't believe his eyes if he saw her tricks. It is a bloo-blooming shame that just because a girl is pretty and knows how to flirt nobody wants to accuse her of che-che-cheating."

"You are catching cold, my boy," said Sloan, coming up behind him. "What is this mysterious conversation between you and Joe?"

"We were discus-cus-cussing one of the players in the tournament," said Tom, and after Sloan made a practice drive to the edge of the green, "it is awful to think of a man who can do that being mashed on a girl who isn't square."

"Round girls are prettier," said Joe.

"It is no joke. Something ought to be—be done. Listen. Why not send the cu-cu-curate around with her? He would not dare li-lie about her score."

"The very thing!" Joe exclaimed.

The clubhouse piazza was crowded with guests to see the players in the tournament drive. The "game with no age limit" included child rising against parent and grandchild against grandparent.

The first to drive was Millionaire Miller. He took plenty of time to arrange his knees, shoulders, elbows, wrists, hands and fingers, gave his body a mighty twist and, as if boring for oil with the toes of his right foot, swung his club hissing through the air. The spectators were breathless. Shading his eye with one hand, Miller strained eagerly forward.

"I didn't follow through," he said excitedly. "Where did it go?"

"I see it, sir," said the caddy, surreptitiously picking up the ball a foot from the tee to find it 175 yards away. He understood his business. He was Miller's favorite caddy.

Pretty Mary Benson came next, looking the picture of innocent girlhood in white linen, the pulled up sleeves showing her plump arms below the elbow. Mr. Morse, the earnest little curate, was delighted to keep her score and followed along, talking eagerly in his high pitched voice.

Tom had brought his huge concert hall graphophone to the clubhouse and set it up in one corner of the parlor to play band music for an impromptu dance in the evening, and he came out on to the piazza just as Mary Benson was about to drive; then he cut across the links on a run and when she and Morse reached the third tee was, to all human appearance, looking for a lost ball some distance off the course.

"Third" was a bad place to drive from, with the brook at the bottom of a sharp incline not fifty yards ahead, and Mary sent her ball—where? The caddy looked in the long grass at one side, and the curate, who admired her beauty, and Tom, who did not admire her at all, looked at Mary. She poked among the stones by the brook with her driver for a minute; then, glancing at Morse, who was apparently adding the score, but really watching her from the corner of his eye, she stooped over, and a ball emerged from the puff above her left elbow.

"Here it is," she called, and, sure enough, there it was on a little flat stone.

"An easy lie," thought Tom, "in two senses."

At that moment Mr. Morse had a surprising accident. He started toward Mary, stumbled at the top of the bank and, unable to stop himself, ran straight into her with such force that they were both hustled into the brook up to their knees and were spattered with muddy water to the tops of their heads. Tom rolled over behind the bushes in an ecstasy of delight.

"By—by jingo! That parson will be an ar-ar-archdeacon yet," he said.

Half an hour later Tom climbed in at the rear window of the clubhouse parlor. He had composed some verses that he meant to record in his graphophone and spring on the company later. He adjusted the blank cylinder, recorder and small horn and was about to repeat them when in walked the Rev. Mr. Morse looking like an evolution from a rummage sale in garments hastily snatched from various lockers. He laughed ruefully.

"I suppose you saw what happened?" he said.

"Wouldn't have missed it for a di-diamond sunburst."

"You did not see anything peculiar, of course, except the accident?" asked Morse anxiously.

"One accident—two de-designs," said Tom promptly.

The curate groaned.

"I simply had to throw her out of the game some way. I could not countenance her score and had not the courage to expose her deceit before so many people."

"It was grand," said Tom. "If she's the sli-sli"—

"She certainly is sly," interrupted the curate.

"slightest good she knew she was li-li"—

"The same as lying," put in the curate.

"likely to get caught," finished Tom.

"I trust you, my boy," said Morse, laying his hand on Tom's shoulder, "but it occurred to me you might tell what you saw to your favorite, Mr. Sloan."

"I shan't say a word, but he ought to know. He might marry her and fi-fi-find out afterward."

"She will never marry him," said Morse.

"He—he thinks she will," said Tom.

"I started to tease her about him, and she made fun of him—imitated his slow way of speaking. A girl may disclaim or protest about a man she really cares for, but ridicule—never! Besides, she gave me to understand she is engaged to Mr. Miller. Here comes Sloan. I do not wish to meet him just now." And the curate escaped from the window.

The handsome young athlete found Tom fussing over his graphophone, taking off the small horn and putting on the big "morning glory."

"Who won the ladies' pin?" he asked.

"Your grandmother," said Sloan, laughing.

"My wh-wh-what?"

"She had a handicap of forty-five on the nine holes and came out ahead of Miss Brown, the English girl, who played the whole course in forty-five."

The crowd on the piazza was cheering and calling for Sloan to present him with the cup which he had won.

"Bring me a drink, Tom, will you? I am choking with thirst and must go outside a minute," said Sloan, throwing himself on the divan.

"That's right—li-li-lie down," said Tom. "You will need to." And, giving the graphophone a final touch that started it going, he left the room.

The blank cylinder intended for Tom's verses had recorded his conversation with the curate, and every word was reproduced for Sloan's benefit.

When Tom returned the room was empty. Sloan had avoided them all, cutting across the fields to town, and neither Tom nor any of his fellow golfers saw him again until he returned from Europe a year later after Miss Benson was married to Millionaire Miller.

THEY WERE BOTH HUSTLED INTO THE BROOK.

Dialects of England.

The dialects of England are so various that grammatical eccentricities are commoner even than among the mixed peoples of the United States. An English paper has been printing some choice examples. In Somersetshire a party of masons are at work. One of their number is idling. The foreman appears.

Joe (warningly)—Hi, Ben, there he gaffer eyin' ee!

Ben—Aye, I eyed ee eye I.

An example from Punch, but true as to dialectic peculiarities, is recalled. It is the reply of a farmer to a former vicar of his parish, who sympathized with him on the fact that his three elderly daughters were not married. "You zee, sur," he said, "when they would ha' they, they wouldn't ha' they. Now they would ha' they, they won't ha' they."

A Curious Epitaph.

One frequently comes across curious epitaphs, but we have never before heard of that useful and necessary kitchen requisite, the "dripping pan," figuring upon a tombstone. The following curious lines, however, are to be found in Woodditton churchyard, near Newmarket, and let into the head of the stone is a dripping pan:

To the Memory of William Simonds, who died March 1, 1753. Aged eighty years.
Here lies my corpse who was the man
That loved a sop in dripping pan
But now believe me I am dead
See here the pan stands at my head
Still for sop to the last I cried
But could not eat and so I died
My neighbors they perhaps may laugh
Now they do read my epitaph.

NATIONAL CAPITAL LETTER

Matters Foremost In the Minds of The Country's Representatives.

Worse reports are received daily by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the fuel famine that is afflicting the northwest. North Dakota is the worst sufferer, and Senator Hansborough has been in receipt of a score of messages showing that the situation there is about as bad as it could be in a civilized country. Towns with as many as 2,500 inhabitants report that they are without a pound of coal, and beg for immediate relief. In other places there are coal supplies for periods of not more than a week or a fortnight, many of the towns having had orders for coal placed in Minneapolis for three months past. They have not been able to get it transported by the railroads.

But the worst situation Senator Hansborough says is likely to reveal itself next spring in the outlying districts where there are 15,000 settlers off the line of the railroads, of whom nothing has been heard and nothing can be heard until the weather moderates. It is always cold in this country in winter time, and this year in addition to having the thermometer from 10 to 38 degrees below zero there have been unusual snows, so that the homestead settlers off the line of the railroad are completely cut off from communication with the towns. Most of these people are living in little frame and tar-papered houses, holding down their homesteads in accordance with law, and it is feared that there may be a sad story to tell of suffering and death among them before the weather moderates sufficiently to send them relief.

The trouble is laid largely at the doors of the railways. Both the Great Northern and Soo Lines, which serve the afflicted territory, devoted all their energies last summer and fall to track laying in the new territory. They transported equipment with utter disregard for services to the communities belonging to distant lines, and the result has been that the settlers have been unable to either get their produce in market, or to provide themselves with sufficient food and fuel against the deadly northern winter.

These are not pleasant days for the railroads. Almost everyone in authority seems to unite in making it unpleasant for them and in addition to the passage rate bill and other "adverse" railway legislation, they are apt to face a world of condemnation in the car shortage and block signal reports soon to be rendered against them by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Eight employes of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, including three of the higher officials, have just been held by the grand jury as a result of the notable wreck at Terra Cotta, near Washington. The officials in question were allowed to go free pending the settlement of their bail, but the trainmen having fewer friends, were incontinently locked up. Representative Murphy of Missouri has already introduced a resolution into the House inquiring why this favorism was shown, and it is probable that the District Attorney will have much explaining to do before he makes this act of favorism appear in a favorable light.

Along with the other matters that are likely to receive attention in the report on the inadequacy of the block signal system is the pay of the men and boys employed by the railroads as block signal telegraph operators. It has already been made clear in the investigation that these men are over crowded with work, and receive such miserable pay that none but the lowest grade of telegraph operators can be found in the railway service. There are in fact three distinct classes of telegraphers. The railway operators, the operators in the employ of the commercial companies, and press operators employed by the newspapers and the big press associations. It might appear to the outsider that the railroad telegraphers, having so much responsibility, would be the highest class of men. As a matter of fact they are the lowest. Their wages run from $30 a month to $55 or $60, and most of them are boys just learning the business. If they prove to be good operators they graduate from railway work into the commercial service and the exceptionally good men are picked from this to man the newspaper wires. The Interstate Commerce Commission intends to devote one section of its report to this subject and will recommend a stiff telegraphic examination such as will effectually debar boys and tyros from the railway service.

It is understood that a new treaty with Santo Domingo will be presented to Congress before the close of the present session, and the chances are that it will pass. This government has made a decided record since it began administering the finances of the turbulent little republic, and has accumulated a balance of over $2,000,000 from the custom receipts, which will be applied to liquidating the government's indebtedness. Further than that the claims of foreign creditors have been revised, and cut down so that instead of a foreign debt of $21,000,000, the foreign claims against the island will aggregate $12,000,000. The internal debt has been scaled down from $9,000,000 to $5,000,000, and this, with the cash in hand, will reduce the island's indebtedness to about $15,000,000, which she could very easily stagger along with were the revenues honestly and judiciously applied by the native government.

Cuba is on the verge of getting a salutary lesson, according to the estimates that are now being made up by the War Department, covering the American occupation since the intervention in Cuba affairs became necessary. The total bill to be rendered by the United States against Cuba will amount to over $4,000,000. This she will have to pay since the United States is in control of the whole island and all her sources of revenue.

Barbarous Treatment of Grooms.

One of our exchanges observes as follows: "Some of the young men are still engaged in the laudable pastime of making marriage ridiculous. Instead of treating a bridegroom and his bride with the respect and consideration that belong to a pair newly wedded, the wedding is turned into a circus and buffoonery of a contemptible sort. The tagging of the bridal coach and the placarding of the house are jokes so ancient and musty that it is remarkable that any persons who do not wish to be placed in the category of witless should perpetrate them.—Everett Republican.

Resigned as B. & O Attorney.

Hon. Wm. G. Conley, who for several years has been the efficient and popular B. & O. counsel for this section, has been succeeded in that position by attorney P. J. Crogan, of Kingwood as chief counsel for the B. & O. in this county and F. E. Parrack of Tunnelton as assistant. It is pretty generally supposed and rumored that the B. & O. and Mr. Conley part company because the latter refused to be dominated by the former in matters political, more particularly refusing to do the bidding of Major Ran Stalnaker. The rumor, however, is not confirmed by either party.—Preston Republican.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
41 5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

SWANTON.

Swanton begins the New Year with a one-year temperance pledge organization, and the Rev. A. R. Snedegar, of Bloomington, Md., will address that organization in the M. E. church of Swanton Friday evening, January 25.

Rev. Mr. Shaw will conduct services in Anderson Chapel, morning and evening, Sunday, January 27.

The very best possible New Year's gift—Mr. Thomas Brightol, of the Swanton telegraph office returned last week from a brief absence the rejoicing possessor of an accomplished bride, and this interesting young couple will reside in Swanton.

GRANTSVILLE.

We are having cold weather at this writing.

The heavy rain fall of last week caused a landslide along Jennings Bros'. Railroad, which delayed traffic several hours.

It is reported Mr. C. H. Jennings, the surviving member of Jennings Bros., has purchased a fine residence at Towanda, Pa., at which place he will likely locate permanently in the near future.

Mr. H. C. Boning wears an extra smile the last few days. It is a girl.

Miss Ethel Broadwater returned to Frederick, Md., where she is a student in the Woman's College.

Rev. McCoy is holding a series of meetings at New Germany and reports good results, quite a number having made application for church membership.

The severe storm on Sunday did a good deal of damage to telephone lines.

Wm. E., commonly known as Grand "Pap" Broadwater is not able to be out yet, but seems to get along nicely considering his age, 94 years and past.

The heavy rain fall of last week is reported to have done a great deal of damage to the roads of this section.

The Epworth League here was well attended Sunday night, Miss Ella Beachy being the leader.

Messrs. J. P. Shirk and A. C. Ober, of the Garrett Lumber Co., spent a day in town last week looking after business here.

Mr. C. M. Tozer, manager for Jennings Bros., was in town Saturday, and reports the lumbers business to be very good.

Saturday was Jennings Bros. pay day, which was welcomed by about 145 laboring men.

Mr. J. O. Getty, cashier of the First National Bank reports this institution to be in excellant condition, the total volume of business being $215,000.

BITTINGER.

The bright pleasant weather at the close of last week put a desire to get to work in the sugar camps into the minds of camp owners.

W. H. Thomas, of Fike, was visiting his son, Lester W. Thomas, at this place last Sunday and Monday.

The high wind on last Sunday did considerable damage to telephone lines and other property, and we learn badly damaged the large wind mill on C. J. Brenneman's farm near this place.

E. F. Durst, who has been staying at Grantsville for some weeks, is again among his friends at this place.

Dr. Boyer, of Accident, was called to this section last week to attend the ailing in our midst.

While crossing the Casselman river last Monday morning on a foot log, Miss Agnes Bittinger, who was going to her school to begin the week's teaching, had a narrow escape from falling into the swollen stream and in order to save herself she was forced to drop her lunch box containing her dinner and a small desk clock into the water and they were carried away by the current.

Manassa Brenneman and friends of near this place, who were visiting for the past several weeks in the west, are home again.

HUTTON.

Burglars broke into the Enterprise store last Saturday night, but did not carry much of value off.

Rev. E. Manges will preach at the school house Thursday evening.

The pupils of the public schools have organized a "Band of Mercy" with 42 charter members.

Miss Boyer, teacher, has the grip.

Mrs. Belle Duvall and daughter, of Oakland, are visiting Mrs. C. F. White.

Porter Fordyce and Hubert Casseday were visiting friends in town last week.

Miss Carrie Adams is spending a week at her uncle's in Rowlesburg.

The waters of Snowy Creek were the highest last week that they have been since 1897.

HOYES.

Mr. Rufus DeWitt has been quite ill for several days past suffering from a severe attack of the grip, but is some what improved at this writing.

Miss Bernadette Mattingly made a flying trip to Oakland last Friday and returned Saturday.

Mr. O'Malley, of Ohio, spent Saturday evening in Hoyes.

Mr. Ode DeWitt and family were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Ham Friend last Sunday.

Mr. J. Arthur DeWitt was a pleasant caller at M. Mattingly's Saturday evening.

Miss Julia Enlow, who has been attending school at Accident, spent Sunday with her parents at this place.

Quite a drop in the temperature—thermometer registering 16 below zero Tuesday night.

AN HONEST GRAFTER

A Glimpse Into the Future of Municipal Ownership.

A Thumb Nail Sketch of a "Practical Politician"—The Profits of an All Around "Servant of the People, Who Seen His Opportunities and Took 'Em."

"Honest graft" will reach its highest level when, as predicted by the enthusiasts, the principles of municipal ownership are accepted by New York and the city controls the trolley lines, the electric light and gas works and all the ferries as well as the waterworks and the police, the fire and the street departments.

Then such patriots as George Washington Plunkitt, for many years organization leader of the Fifteenth district in New York, will reap rewards of greater magnitude than they have ever been able to gather under the present order of things.

Perhaps you have never heard about Mr. Plunkitt's "honest graft" schemes. He told about them himself in a book published last year, which was introduced by a paragraph indorsing him as a "veteran leader of the organization," signed by its greatest chief.

Plunkitt was sore because there were some objections to graft being made out of the city by men like him, and in the first chapter of his book he uttered a vigorous protest. "Blackmailin' gamblers, saloon keepers, disorderly people, etc.," he admitted to be wrong. That was "dishonest graft."

"But," he added, "there's an honest graft, and I'm an example of how it works. I seen my opportunities and I took 'em."

Mr. Plunkitt's explanation of how he did these things will illuminate the possibilities of future municipal ownership days, if they ever come.

After elucidating the ways he was "tipped off" at various times by members of his party—the party in power—when new bridges, new parks, new streets were to be opened, so that he might invest in real estate likely to rise in price from the improvements contemplated, he adds: "I haven't confined myself to land. Anything that pays is in my line." Then he gives a specific instance:

Learning that the city was about to repave a certain street and so would have several hundred thousand old paving blocks to sell, he was "on hand to buy," and he "knew just what they were worth." But a newspaper "tried to do him" and got some outside men from Brooklyn and New Jersey to bid against him. Mr. Plunkitt's own words tell the story best:

"Was I done? Not much. I went to each of the men and said, 'How many of those 250,000 stones do you want?' One said 20,000, and another wanted 15,000, and another wanted 10,000. I said, 'All right; let me bid for the lot, and I'll give each of you all you want for nothin'.'

"They agreed, of course. Then the auctioneer yelled, 'How much am I bid for these fine pavin' stones?'

"'Two dollars and fifty cents,' says I.

"'Two dollars and fifty cents!' screamed the auctioneer. 'Oh, that's a joke. Give me a real bid.'

"He found the bid was real enough. My rivals stood silent. I got the lot for $2.50 and gave them their share. That's how the attempt to do Plunkitt ended, and that's how all such attempts end."

It is hardly necessary, in the light of this authentic statement of "honest graft's" workings, to enlarge upon the extended opportunities that would come to the men of the Plunkitt stamp were the dream of municipal ownership to come true. Plunkitt says "most politicians who are accused of robbin' the city get rich the same way" he did.

"They didn't steal a dollar from the city. They just seen their opportunities and took them."

While in the legislature Plunkitt introduced the bills that provided for the outlying parks of New York, the Harlem river speedway, the Washington bridge, the One Hundred and Fifty-fifth street viaduct, additions to the Museum of Natural History and many other important public improvements. He is now a millionaire. Under the proposed order of things, with city control of everything, he might become a billionaire.

Under municipal ownership of all public utilities in New York—and in most other cities in fact—politicians like Plunkitt, who at different times has been elected state senator, assemblyman, county supervisor and alderman by his fellow citizens, besides serving as police magistrate for one term, and who boasts of his record in filling four public offices in one year and drawing salaries from three of them at the same time, would flourish like a whole grove of green bay trees.

Go Slow on City Ownership.

Until politics in America is purified far beyond its present condition any large experiment in government ownership may be called a "thief breeder" with much safety. The more authority there is vested in the hands of politicians (with all due deference to our national administration) the more corruption there will be. It is a short-sighted citizen who would take more business out of private hands and commit it to the tender mercies of the politicians.—Troy Press.

Another Plant Abandoned.

After many years' trial of its municipal electric lighting plant Alexandria, Va., has finally leased the works to a private corporation for a period of thirty years. The lessee paid $3,500 for the plant, which had cost the city $17,000.

Her Sense of Justice Wouldn't Stand For It

"TWO hundred dollars, please."

The New York drawing room was crowded with a fashionable throng on the eve of departure. The hostess, standing near the doorway, addressed her remark to a quiet, innocent looking lady who was about to pass through and who now viewed her with astonishment.

"Two hundred dollars!" she exclaimed. "What for?"

"That is your loss at bridge for the evening," said the hostess.

"But," exclaimed her guest, "I had no idea that we were playing for money. Why, I wouldn't do such a thing. What can you mean?"

"You don't suppose for one instant," said the hostess haughtily, "that we were playing for our health, do you? It is the usual thing."

"But I haven't got the money with me."

"Then you can send me a check—at once."

The guest, her sense of justice fully aroused by the imposition practiced upon her, drew herself up proudly.

"I am, as you know, not long a resident here," she observed. "It seems to me nothing short of robbery. Suppose I refuse to pay this money?"

The hostess shrugged her shoulders meaningly.

"If you do," she replied, with a fine cutting contempt, "there is no hope for you. From this time forward you will cease to be an honored and respected member of our sacred circle."—Tom Masson in Judge.

Dog Bit the Wrong Trick.

The Irishman wanted to sell the dog but the prospective buyer was suspicious and finally decided not to buy. The man then told him why he was so anxious to sell. "You see," he said, "I bought the dog and trained him myself. I got him so he'd bark all the time if a person stepped inside the gate, and I thought I was safe from burglars. Then my wife wanted me to train him to carry bundles, and I did. If I put a packet in his mouth the dog would keep it there till some one took it away. Well, one night I woke up and heard some one in the next room. I got up and grabbed my gun. They were there—three of the scoundrels and the dog."

"Didn't he bark?" interrupted the man.

"Sorry a bark; he was too busy."

"Busy! What doing?"

"Carrying a lantern for the burglars."—Dublin Freeman.

John Chinaman.

A prominent lady in San Francisco engaged a Chinaman as cook. When the Celestial came, among other things she asked him his name.

"My name," said the Chinaman smiling, "is Hang Shoo Wang Ho."

"Oh, I can't remember all that," said the lady. "I will just call you John."

John smiled all over and asked:

"What your namee?"

"My name is Mrs. Franklin Preston Benton."

"Me no 'member all that," said John. "Chinaman he no sabey Mrs. Franklin Preston Benton. I call you Tommy."—Harper's Weekly.

Self Sacrifice.

Mr. Bodger (heroically)—Here, you take the umbrella, Maria. Never mind about me!—Black and White.

Not the New England Variety.

"Oh, they're real swell people," said the Chicago man, "an old 'Mayflower family,' I believe."

"You mean their ancestors came over in the Mayflower?" asked the visitor from the east.

"Oh, no! I mean they made their money in 'Mayflower hams,' oldest brand o' hams in this section."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Not Enthusiastic.

"Some day we shall be conversing with the inhabitants of Mars."

"I hope not," answered the weary business man. "The telephone tolls for conversation within the narrow limits of this earth are big enough to make one shudder at the thought."—Washington Star.

Housewives, Listen!

[Berlin.—Emperor William regards good cooking as being necessary to the contentment of the people.]

Hasenpfeffer, metzelsoup,
Lebergliese und wein,
Sauerbratten, lagerbier,
Ach, my, dot is fein!
Eingemachte herring fish,
Blutwurst und pancakes—
Himmel, how all dese shweed dings
Beoples habby makes!

Charged Him For His Cyclone Experience

"I STARTED out in life with a firm resolve to be honest," said the Boston drummer, "but now and then I have bumped up against a situation that shook my resolution.

"Such a case happened while I was in Texas last summer. I was stopping at a village hotel called the Cyclone House and had been in bed about two hours when I found myself being carried across the country in the midst of boards, beams and furniture. A cyclone had come along and picked that old house up and made matchwood of it. There were ten people killed and twice that many injured. I had to lay up with a farmer for a week and then resumed business.

"It never occurred to me until a month later that I ought to have settled my hotel bill before departing. The landlord had been one of the killed and the town about wiped out, but so heavily did the thing prey on my conscience that I made a trip of a hundred miles to square things. I found the landlord's widow, and she was willing to take my word as to how long I had been a guest when the cyclone swooped down. I figured it up and handed her the proper amount, but she seemed to have something on her mind. When I told her to speak out she said:

"'This settles the hotel bill all right, but what about the experience?'

"'How do you mean, ma'am?'

"'Why, hadn't there ought to be at least a dollar more for your cyclone experience?'

"I agreed with her and handed over the greenback, but the more I think of it the more I am inclined to believe that it was pushing an honest man a little bit too hard."

Just Like a Man.

"John," said Mrs. Stubbs, "suppose you were sitting in a car and should see a poor, tottering woman collapse because she had been holding a strap for twentw blocks. What would you do?"

"Why," replied Mr. Stubbs, "I am so tender hearted I think I should hide my face."

"Ah, in grief?"

"No; in a newspaper."—Detroit Tribune.

NATIONAL CAPITAL LETTER

Matters Foremost In the Minds of The Country's Representatives.

Worse reports are received daily by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the fuel famine that is afflicting the northwest. North Dakota is the worst sufferer, and Senator Hansborough has been in receipt of a score of messages showing that the situation there is about as bad as it could be in a civilized country. Towns with as many as 2,500 inhabitants report that they are without a pound of coal, and beg for immediate relief. In other places there are coal supplies for periods of not more than a week or a fortnight, many of the towns having had orders for coal placed in Minneapolis for three months past. They have not been able to get it transported by the railroads.

But the worst situation Senator Hansborough says is likely to reveal itself next spring in the outlying districts where there are 15,000 settlers off the line of the railroads, of whom nothing has been heard and nothing can be heard until the weather moderates. It is always cold in this country in winter time, and this year in addition to having the thermometer from 10 to 38 degrees below zero there have been unusual snows, so that the homestead settlers off the line of the railroad are completely cut off from communication with the towns. Most of these people are living in little frame and tar-papered houses, holding down their homesteads in accordance with law, and it is feared that there may be a sad story to tell of suffering and death among them before the weather moderates sufficiently to send them relief.

The trouble is laid largely at the doors of the railways. Both the Great Northern and Soo Lines, which serve the afflicted territory, devoted all their energies last summer and fall to track laying in the new territory. They transported equipment with utter disregard for services to the communities belonging to distant lines, and the result has been that the settlers have been unable to either get their produce in market, or to provide themselves with sufficient food and fuel against the deadly northern winter.

These are not pleasant days for the railroads. Almost everyone in authority seems to unite in making it unpleasant for them and in addition to the passage rate bill and other "adverse" railway legislation, they are apt to face a world of condemnation in the car shortage and block signal reports soon to be rendered against them by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Eight employes of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway, including three of the higher officials, have just been held by the grand jury as a result of the notable wreck at Terra Cotta, near Washington. The officials in question were allowed to go free pending the settlement of their bail, but the trainmen having fewer friends, were incontinently locked up. Representative Murphy of Missouri has already introduced a resolution into the House inquiring why this favorism was shown, and it is probable that the District Attorney will have much explaining to do before he makes this act of favorism appear in a favorable light.

Along with the other matters that are likely to receive attention in the report on the inadequacy of the block signal system is the pay of the men and boys employed by the railroads as block signal telegraph operators. It has already been made clear in the investigation that these men are over crowded with work, and receive such miserable pay that none but the lowest grade of telegraph operators can be found in the railway service. There are in fact three distinct classes of telegraphers. The railway operators, the operators in the employ of the commercial companies, and press operators employed by the newspapers and the big press associations. It might appear to the outsider that the railroad telegraphers, having so much responsibility, would be the highest class of men. As a matter of fact they are the lowest. Their wages run from $30 a month to $55 or $60, and most of them are boys just learning the business. If they prove to be good operators they graduate from railway work into the commercial service and the exceptionally good men are picked from this to man the newspaper wires. The Interstate Commerce Commission intends to devote one section of its report to this subject and will recommend a stiff telegraphic examination such as will effectually debar boys and tyros from the railway service.

It is understood that a new treaty with Santo Domingo will be presented to Congress before the close of the present session, and the chances are that it will pass. This government has made a decided record since it began administering the finances of the turbulent little republic, and has accumulated a balance of over $2,000,000 from the custom receipts, which will be applied to liquidating the government's indebtedness. Further than that the claims of foreign creditors have been revised, and cut down so that instead of a foreign debt of $21,000,000, the foreign claims against the island will aggregate $12,000,000. The internal debt has been scaled down from $9,000,000 to $5,000,000, and this, with the cash in hand, will reduce the island's indebtedness to about $15,000,000, which she could very easily stagger along with were the revenues honestly and judiciously applied by the native government.

Cuba is on the verge of getting a salutary lesson, according to the estimates that are now being made up by the War Department, covering the American occupation since the intervention in Cuba affairs became necessary. The total bill to be rendered by the United States against Cuba will amount to over $4,000,000. This she will have to pay since the United States is in control of the whole island and all her sources of revenue.

Church Services.

Barbarous Treatment of Grooms.

One of our exchanges observes as follows: "Some of the young men are still engaged in the laudable pastime of making marriage ridiculous. Instead of treating a bridegroom and his bride with the respect and consideration that belong to a pair newly wedded, the wedding is turned into a circus and buffoonery of a contemptible sort. The tagging of the bridal coach and the placarding of the house are jokes so ancient and musty that it is remarkable that any persons who do not wish to be placed in the category of witless should perpetrate them.—Everett Republican.

Resigned as B. & O Attorney.

Hon. Wm. G. Conley, who for several years has been the efficient and popular B. & O. counsel for this section, has been succeeded in that position by attorney P. J. Crogan, of Kingwood as chief counsel for the B. & O. in this county and F. E. Parrack of Tunnelton as assistant. It is pretty generally supposed and rumored that the B. & O. and Mr. Conley part company because the latter refused to be dominated by the former in matters political, more particularly refusing to do the bidding of Major Ran Stalnaker. The rumor, however, is not confirmed by either party.—Preston Republican.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
41 5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

SWANTON.

Swanton begins the New Year with a one-year temperance pledge organization, and the Rev. A. R. Snedegar, of Bloomington, Md., will address that organization in the M. E. church of Swanton Friday evening, January 25.

Rev. Mr. Shaw will conduct services in Anderson Chapel, morning and evening, Sunday, January 27.

The very best possible New Year's gift—Mr. Thomas Brightol, of the Swanton telegraph office returned last week from a brief absence the rejoicing possessor of an accomplished bride, and this interesting young couple will reside in Swanton.

GRANTSVILLE.

We are having cold weather at this writing.

The heavy rain fall of last week caused a landslide along Jennings Bros'. Railroad, which delayed traffic several hours.

It is reported Mr. C. H. Jennings, the surviving member of Jennings Bros., has purchased a fine residence at Towanda, Pa., at which place he will likely locate permanently in the near future.

Mr. H. C. Boning wears an extra smile the last few days. It is a girl.

Miss Ethel Broadwater returned to Frederick, Md., where she is a student in the Woman's College.

Rev. McCoy is holding a series of meetings at New Germany and reports good results, quite a number having made application for church membership.

The severe storm on Sunday did a good deal of damage to telephone lines.

Wm. E., commonly known as Grand "Pap" Broadwater is not able to be out yet, but seems to get along nicely considering his age, 94 years and past.

The heavy rain fall of last week is reported to have done a great deal of damage to the roads of this section.

The Epworth League here was well attended Sunday night, Miss Ella Beachy being the leader.

Messrs. J. P. Shirk and A. C. Ober, of the Garrett Lumber Co., spent a day in town last week looking after business here.

Mr. C. M. Tozer, manager for Jennings Bros., was in town Saturday, and reports the lumbers business to be very good.

Saturday was Jennings Bros. pay day, which was welcomed by about 145 laboring men.

Mr. J. O. Getty, cashier of the First National Bank reports this institution to be in excellant condition, the total volume of business being $215,000.

BITTINGER.

The bright pleasant weather at the close of last week put a desire to get to work in the sugar camps into the minds of camp owners.

W. H. Thomas, of Fike, was visiting his son, Lester W. Thomas, at this place last Sunday and Monday.

The high wind on last Sunday did considerable damage to telephone lines and other property, and we learn badly damaged the large wind mill on C. J. Brenneman's farm near this place.

E. F. Durst, who has been staying at Grantsville for some weeks, is again among his friends at this place.

Dr. Boyer, of Accident, was called to this section last week to attend the ailing in our midst.

While crossing the Casselman river last Monday morning on a foot log, Miss Agnes Bittinger, who was going to her school to begin the week's teaching, had a narrow escape from falling into the swollen stream and in order to save herself she was forced to drop her lunch box containing her dinner and a small desk clock into the water and they were carried away by the current.

Manassa Brenneman and friends of near this place, who were visiting for the past several weeks in the west, are home again.

HUTTON.

Burglars broke into the Enterprise store last Saturday night, but did not carry much of value off.

Rev. E. Manges will preach at the school house Thursday evening.

The pupils of the public schools have organized a "Band of Mercy" with 42 charter members.

Miss Boyer, teacher, has the grip.

Mrs. Belle Duvall and daughter, of Oakland, are visiting Mrs. C. F. White.

Porter Fordyce and Hubert Casseday were visiting friends in town last week.

Miss Carrie Adams is spending a week at her uncle's in Rowlesburg.

The waters of Snowy Creek were the highest last week that they have been since 1897.

HOYES.

Mr. Rufus DeWitt has been quite ill for several days past suffering from a severe attack of the grip, but is some what improved at this writing.

Miss Bernadette Mattingly made a flying trip to Oakland last Friday and returned Saturday.

Mr. O'Malley, of Ohio, spent Saturday evening in Hoyes.

Mr. Ode DeWitt and family were guests of Mr. and Mrs. Ham Friend last Sunday.

Mr. J. Arthur DeWitt was a pleasant caller at M. Mattingly's Saturday evening.

Miss Julia Enlow, who has been attending school at Accident, spent Sunday with her parents at this place.

Quite a drop in the temperature—thermometer registering 16 below zero Tuesday night.

AN HONEST GRAFTER

A Glimpse Into the Future of Municipal Ownership.

A Thumb Nail Sketch of a "Practical Politician"—The Profits of an All Around "Servant of the People, Who Seen His Opportunities and Took 'Em."

"Honest graft" will reach its highest level when, as predicted by the enthusiasts, the principles of municipal ownership are accepted by New York and the city controls the trolley lines, the electric light and gas works and all the ferries as well as the waterworks and the police, the fire and the street departments.

Then such patriots as George Washington Plunkitt, for many years organization leader of the Fifteenth district in New York, will reap rewards of greater magnitude than they have ever been able to gather under the present order of things.

Perhaps you have never heard about Mr. Plunkitt's "honest graft" schemes. He told about them himself in a book published last year, which was introduced by a paragraph indorsing him as a "veteran leader of the organization," signed by its greatest chief.

Plunkitt was sore because there were some objections to graft being made out of the city by men like him, and in the first chapter of his book he uttered a vigorous protest. "Blackmailin' gamblers, saloon keepers, disorderly people, etc.," he admitted to be wrong. That was "dishonest graft."

"But," he added, "there's an honest graft, and I'm an example of how it works. I seen my opportunities and I took 'em."

Mr. Plunkitt's explanation of how he did these things will illuminate the possibilities of future municipal ownership days, if they ever come.

After elucidating the ways he was "tipped off" at various times by members of his party—the party in power—when new bridges, new parks, new streets were to be opened, so that he might invest in real estate likely to rise in price from the improvements contemplated, he adds: "I haven't confined myself to land. Anything that pays is in my line." Then he gives a specific instance:

Learning that the city was about to repave a certain street and so would have several hundred thousand old paving blocks to sell, he was "on hand to buy," and he "knew just what they were worth." But a newspaper "tried to do him" and got some outside men from Brooklyn and New Jersey to bid against him. Mr. Plunkitt's own words tell the story best:

"Was I done? Not much. I went to each of the men and said, 'How many of those 250,000 stones do you want?' One said 20,000, and another wanted 15,000, and another wanted 10,000. I said, 'All right; let me bid for the lot, and I'll give each of you all you want for nothin'.'

"They agreed, of course. Then the auctioneer yelled, 'How much am I bid for these fine pavin' stones?'

"'Two dollars and fifty cents,' says I.

"'Two dollars and fifty cents!' screamed the auctioneer. 'Oh, that's a joke. Give me a real bid.'

"He found the bid was real enough. My rivals stood silent. I got the lot for $2.50 and gave them their share. That's how the attempt to do Plunkitt ended, and that's how all such attempts end."

It is hardly necessary, in the light of this authentic statement of "honest graft's" workings, to enlarge upon the extended opportunities that would come to the men of the Plunkitt stamp were the dream of municipal ownership to come true. Plunkitt says "most politicians who are accused of robbin' the city get rich the same way" he did.

"They didn't steal a dollar from the city. They just seen their opportunities and took them."

While in the legislature Plunkitt introduced the bills that provided for the outlying parks of New York, the Harlem river speedway, the Washington bridge, the One Hundred and Fifty-fifth street viaduct, additions to the Museum of Natural History and many other important public improvements. He is now a millionaire. Under the proposed order of things, with city control of everything, he might become a billionaire.

Under municipal ownership of all public utilities in New York—and in most other cities in fact—politicians like Plunkitt, who at different times has been elected state senator, assemblyman, county supervisor and alderman by his fellow citizens, besides serving as police magistrate for one term, and who boasts of his record in filling four public offices in one year and drawing salaries from three of them at the same time, would flourish like a whole grove of green bay trees.

Go Slow on City Ownership.

Until politics in America is purified far beyond its present condition any large experiment in government ownership may be called a "thief breeder" with much safety. The more authority there is vested in the hands of politicians (with all due deference to our national administration) the more corruption there will be. It is a short-sighted citizen who would take more business out of private hands and commit it to the tender mercies of the politicians.—Troy Press.

Another Plant Abandoned.

After many years' trial of its municipal electric lighting plant Alexandria, Va., has finally leased the works to a private corporation for a period of thirty years. The lessee paid $3,500 for the plant, which had cost the city $17,000.

Her Sense of Justice Wouldn't Stand For It

"TWO hundred dollars, please."

The New York drawing room was crowded with a fashionable throng on the eve of departure. The hostess, standing near the doorway, addressed her remark to a quiet, innocent looking lady who was about to pass through and who now viewed her with astonishment.

"Two hundred dollars!" she exclaimed. "What for?"

"That is your loss at bridge for the evening," said the hostess.

"But," exclaimed her guest, "I had no idea that we were playing for money. Why, I wouldn't do such a thing. What can you mean?"

"You don't suppose for one instant," said the hostess haughtily, "that we were playing for our health, do you? It is the usual thing."

"But I haven't got the money with me."

"Then you can send me a check—at once."

The guest, her sense of justice fully aroused by the imposition practiced upon her, drew herself up proudly.

"I am, as you know, not long a resident here," she observed. "It seems to me nothing short of robbery. Suppose I refuse to pay this money?"

The hostess shrugged her shoulders meaningly.

"If you do," she replied, with a fine cutting contempt, "there is no hope for you. From this time forward you will cease to be an honored and respected member of our sacred circle."—Tom Masson in Judge.

Dog Did the Wrong Trick.

The Irishman wanted to sell the dog but the prospective buyer was suspicious and finally decided not to buy. The man then told him why he was so anxious to sell. "You see," he said, "I bought the dog and trained him myself. I got him so he'd bark all the time if a person stepped inside the gate, and I thought I was safe from burglars. Then my wife wanted me to train him to carry bundles, and I did. If I put a packet in his mouth the dog would keep it there till some one took it away. Well, one night I woke up and heard some one in the next room. I got up and grabbed my gun. There were there—three of the scoundrels and the dog."

"Didn't he bark?" interrupted the man.

"Sorry a bark; he was too busy."

"Busy! What doing?"

"Carrying a lantern for the burglars."—Dublin Freeman.

John Chinaman.

A prominent lady in San Francisco engaged a Chinaman as cook. When the Celestial came, among other things she asked him his name.

"My name," said the Chinaman smiling, "is Hang Shoo Wang Ho."

"Oh, I can't remember all that," said the lady. "I will just call you John."

John smiled all over and asked:

"What your namee?"

"My name is Mrs. Franklin Preston Benton."

"Me no 'member all that," said John. "Chinaman he no sabey Mrs. Franklin Preston Benton. I call you Tommy."—Harper's Weekly.

Self Sacrifice.

Mr. Bodger (heroically)—Here, you take the umbrella, Maria. Never mind about me!—Black and White.

Not the New England Variety.

"Oh, they're real swell people," said the Chicago man, "an old 'Mayflower family,' I believe."

"You mean their ancestors came over in the Mayflower?" asked the visitor from the east.

"Oh, no! I mean they made their money in 'Mayflower hams,' oldest brand o' hams in this section."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Not Enthusiastic.

"Some day we shall be conversing with the inhabitants of Mars."

"I hope not," answered the weary business man. "The telephone tolls for conversation within the narrow limits of this earth are big enough to make one shudder at the thought."—Washington Star.

Housewives, Listen!

[Berlin.—Emperor William regards good cooking as being necessary to the contentment of the people.]

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 30. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, JANUARY 31, 1907. NUMBER 48

ACCIDENTALLY SHOT HIMSELF.

William Feather Received Load of Bird Shot in His Right Side.

William Feather, aged nineteen years, son of Joseph Feather, who resides on a farm adjoining Crellin, four miles from Oakland, was seriously wounded last Thursday afternoon by the discharge of his shot gun, the load of shot penetrating his right side and inflicting a flesh wound.

Young Feather had been in the woods gunning when he attempted to set the stock of his gun upon a log covered with snow and ice. The firearm slipped off and the hammer coming in contact with the log fired it, the load penetrating his right side just below his ribs. The gun being fired from an angle the shot went through the flesh and underneath the muscles of his side, and taking an upward course were extracted above the right hip by Dr. Legge, who was called to attend the injured man.

The patient is recovering rapidly.

The Honest Printer.

Various newspapers in the country have commented, mirthfully and otherwise, on the fact that the Ohio Penitentiary News has been forced to suspend publication because there are no printers in that institution to set the type and get out the paper. Very naturally the circumstance is considered creditable to the craft. There are more than twenty bankers in the Ohio penitentiary, with lawyers, doctors, brokers and other "highly respectable" citizens to spare, but not a single printer is numbered among the convicts, and the Lord only knows when there will be. Hurrah for the art preservative!—Portland (Me.) Advertiser.

Big Class Initiation.

In response to a pressing invitation from Olive Branch Castle, No. 9, Knights of the Golden Eagle, Mountain Lake Park, Grand Chief Peter Lammert, accompanied by a degree team from Mountain Castle, No. 16, of this place, went up Monday evening and initiated a class of 29. This class was representative of that excellent community, including its leading business and professional men.

The degrees were conferred by Past Chiefs who filled the positions below mentioned:

Past Chief.....Grand Chief Peter Lammert
Noble Chief.....William H. Crump
Vice Chief.....William Kight
Sir Herald.....John Lehr
High Priest.....Charles B. Folk
Venerable Hermit..Richard O. Layman
Worthy Chamberlain....Henry F. Cook
Ensign.....James Coddington
Esquire.....T. S. Preston
Guardsman.....Charles A. Rodda

When the ritualistic work was completed the pastor of the M. E. church spoke eulogistically of the exemplification of the degrees and the high aims and purposes of the Order. His long connection with the Order, and a comparison with five other secret organizations of which he is a member, he said, convinced him that Golden Eagledom is equal to any and in advance of many in "winning this world for good, for glory and for God."

The dining room of a near-by hotel, now unoccupied, served as an elegant banquet-hall, in which an abundance of the most seasonable refreshments were served by the lady friends of the Castle.

The remaining time was spent in social chat and "when the gray streaks of morn lit up the Eastern sky" the bays "hoofed" it to Oakland to catch the train, as only a few trains stop at Mountain Lake Park during the winter.

The Frostburgers speak in the highest terms of the personnel of Olive Branch Castle, its generous hospitality and look forward with expectancy to a return trip.—Frostburg Journal.

HOYES.

All, both old and young, are taking advantage of the fine sleighing we are having at this time.

Mr. Patrick Maroney was in our town a few hours Monday evening of this week.

Mr. Wm. Frazee, wife and children of Accident, were guests of M. Mattingly's last Sunday.

Mr. W. A. Smith was on a business trip to Oakland several days this week.

Messrs. Colonel DeWitt and Ralph Brenneman spent several days the past week at Friendsville as guests of the Riverside Hotel.

Miss Bertha Custer spent last Sunday with Miss Icie Friend at Elder.

Miss Sadie DeWitt accompanied by her cousin James Wilburn, attended services at Elder Tuesday evening.

Miss Olive DeWitt was visiting relatives in this community last Sunday.

Quite a number of teachers from this and adjoining schools took in the teachers' institute at Friendsville last Friday and Saturday.

Mr. W. G. Glotfelty spent last Sunday at F. D. DeWitt's.

Miss Marie Grovemiller was a visitor at the Hoyes school one afternoon this week.

Miss Bernadette Mattingly accompanied by Mr. J. Arthur DeWitt spent Tuesday evening at Accident.

Mr. Willie Mattingly and wife spent last Sunday at James McGettigan's.

Mr. George E. Bishoff and daughter attended institute at Friendsville.

Miss Jessie Lowdermilk and brother Harry were the guests of W. A. Smith's last Sunday.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM MR. KELSO

What a Garrett Countian Observed in the Southwest.

To the Editor of The Republican.

When writing to THE REPUBLICAN from San Antonio, Texas, I omitted to mention that flowers were in bloom and the thermometer registered 79 degrees in the shade.

When about to leave San Antonio a gentleman said "how far are you going to travel on the Southern Pacific railroad?" I answered, "to El Paso." He said his name was Hansley and that he had a private car, conveying a prospecting party to Valentine, Texas, 450 miles distant, to look at a large tract of land, and that he would be pleased to have me travel in his car. I accepted the invitation and upon entering the car I found thirteen jolly Illinois and Indiana farmers. After supper we retired. When we awoke the next morning the sky was bright and the air much cooler. Upon inquiry we ascertained that we were 250 miles from San Antonio, and that the altitude was 2000 feet.

As we viewed the landscape it appeared like a grand panorama with great stretches of table land, with mounds and mountains in the back ground. This is a great grazing country, as evidenced by thousands of cattle.

Before reaching Valentine the gentleman conducting the party insisted upon me stopping with the rest and take a drive over the country. We arrived in Valentine in the forenoon. It is a small town at the end of a railroad division and has an altitude of 4,424 feet.

After securing conveyances our party, eighteen in number, drove thirty-two miles over the country. There are two or three hundred thousand acres of land in the Van Horn valley, surrounded by picturesque mountains.

We visited several cattle ranches, containing thousands of Herford cattle, also quite a number of ponies and donkeys or burros. The stock are in fine condition. Stock ranching here is very profitable. I was told of a man who came here twenty years ago, five hundred dollars in debt, and he is now rated at a quarter of a million dollars. Ranchers rent land at four cents an acre.

Land here has been on the market only since last April. Very little farming has been done here, and it has not been fully demonstrated to be successful on account of the light rainfall. However, I saw some fine fruit trees. Land sells from two dollars and fifty cents to ten dollars and fifty cents an acre.

We continued our journey to El Paso next day, passing through a country containing cacti by the thousand acres. When about ninety miles east of El Paso an altitude of over five thousand feet was reached. We found El Paso a thriving city of forty thousand people. My observations here were few, as I took an early train to Las Cruces, New Mexico. On my return I shall stop off in El Paso, and may in a later letter to THE REPUBLICAN tell of this town and the interesting little city of Juarez, Mexico, which is just across the river.

Las Cruces has an altitude of 3,876 feet. The climate is delightful,—the days clear and warm, the nights cool and pleasant. The air is light and dry. It is so clear that the Organ Mountains, eighteen miles away, appear to be not more than three miles distant.

Las Cruces contains about four thousand inhabitants. It is the county seat of Dona Ana county. It takes its name, which means "The Crosses," from an early conflict of the Mexican settlers with a band of marauding Indians. A battle took place near where the town now is. Nearly all the Mexicans engaged were killed and buried where they fell. Crosses were erected at the graves, hence the name.

Las Cruces is situated in the center of the Mesilla Valley. The valley is about forty miles long and from one to six miles wide. It is watered by the Rio Grande river. There is a system of irrigation ditches carrying the water to the farms and gardens. In the early history of the valley water was plentiful and the people were prosperous, but in later years a considerable portion of the water has been consumed in Colorado and in dry years the people in the Mesilla Valley, in the Texas Valley, and in the Republic of Mexico, have suffered greatly.

The water of the Rio Grande comes from the melting mountain snows. In May and June when the snows are melting fastest disastrous floods sometimes result. The trouble is not that there is not enough water, but in getting it at the right time. During a flood waters which are of inestimable value if only they could be used in the hot, dry summer months, go rushing madly by, overflowing valuable farms. To prevent this waste of the flood waters and to protect the country from floods, a large dam is necessary. Private capital has undertaken the construction of a dam to meet the conditions but all private enterprises of the kind with regard to this project have failed, by reason of its sheer magnitude. By good fortune, however, the Reclamation Service of the United States has become interested in this project, now known as the Elephant Butte Project. The Service has agreed with people of the valley to build a large dam to retain the waters of the Rio Grande. This project when completed is estimated to cost about $7,000,000. Already the Service has let a contract for a small dam to divert the water from the river into the ditches, costing $200,000. This diversion dam will be completed by next May.

The assurance of water in the future gives this country a bright prospect. Many eastern and northern people are being attracted here. There is plenty room for a large population. Only a small part of the valley is as yet under cultivation.

Jean Viljeon, general of the late Boer army, bought a large farm not long ago near Las Cruces. It is his purpose to establish a colony here, composed of Boers dissatisfied with British rule at home. The general seems to have in him the making of as good a farmer as he was a soldier.

This valley is adapted to growing almost all kinds of crops. Alfalfa is the most profitable crop at present. It is called the lazy man's crop, as it requires very little work, besides harvesting and irrigating. When once planted successfully it, unlike clover, requires no reseeding. In favorable years five crops can be cut. It is considered a better food that clover or timothy for fattening stock. Wheat grows and yields well. Fruits of all kinds do well, especially grapes. Nothing is more delicious than the Mission grape which is as sweet as sugar. The Muscal grape is also a decided favorite. Its flavor is excellent and it is a good keeper. We are all familiar with the California product packed in saw dust. A white wine is made from this grape which is very high in alcohol. Apples, though grown successfully, are not as well adapted to this climate as other fruits.

About three miles from Las Cruces is the old town of Mesilla. It is a typical Mexican village. In appearance it is very much delapidated. Many of the adobe house have partly fallen down, and one can with difficulty imagine that this was once a prosperous town. During the Civil War and several years following this was a stirring place.

The Overland Mail Company ran stages from St. Louis to California passing through this place. There was also a stage line from Santa Fe to Mexico. It was soon after the war that Senator Stephen B. Elkins came to the territory and located in Mesilla. It was here that he and Thomas B. Catron, now a leading lawyer of Santa Fe, studied law. Senator Elkins even in that early day took a keen interest in politics, and soon afterwards he represented the territory in Congress.

FIKE.

Not having seen anything from this point in your valuable paper for some weeks and supposing that "Sunflower" and "One Who Knows," have both perished, I will write a few lines.

At this writing it looks favorable for good sledding.

We understand that L. K. Fike is making all preparations necessary for a Washington's Birthday entertainment at his school.

I am informed that Jasper Fike spends two nights every week down in town.

U. S. Savage has sold his farm and the greater part of "our town" for the sum of $1,300.

Mr. F. J. Bowser met with an accident a few days ago. He got cut in the head with an axe by one of his sons. His boys were splitting pit props and he walked up behind one of them and not knowing his father was behind him he was cut in the head. Dr. Meyers was called and he put in three stitches to close the cut.

We extend our congratulations to "One Who Knows" for telling a few facts concerning the Fike postoffice as the postmaster says it had the required effect.

Mr. F. J. Bowser is one of the leading fur dealers of this section. He bought two minks and shipped them and after getting his returns he quit the business.

Mr. F. T. Fike is well pleased that the supervisorship has been given to some one else and the people of this county may be glad if they get even worse things than fish ponds in the breakers.

SUDDEN DEATH OF A TEAMSTER.

His Lifeless Body Found Beneath Loaded Lumber Sled Monday Morning.

This deplorable occurrence took place about 8 o'clock Monday morning, January 29, 1907. Mr. Lansbery was a teamster at the Luzier saw mill east of Swanton and near the Potomac river.

The victim of the accident, it appears, left the mill at 7.30 in the morning with a sled partly loaded with lumber for Barnum, four miles from the mill. In about twenty minutes the mentioned sled was followed by another sled which soon overtook the Lansbery sled, standing still on a good road, with one horse partly thrown down by the strained tension of a rein caught under the runner of the loaded sled, while under the rear runner, on the same side, laid the lifeless body of Mr. Lansbery. The teamster hastened back for aid and the body still warm was quickly extricated from its horrible position.

No plausible explanation of the accident can be had. Dr. Fazenbaker found the neck broken and it is surmised that the unfortunate man lost his balance, or in an effort to recover his fallen rein, fell forward, was caught under the runner and dragged a short distance.

He was nearly fifty-two years of age and leaves in Swanton a very dependent family of a wife and three small children, and leaves also seven children from a previous marriage. The remains will be taken to Tucker county, W. Va., for interment among relatives.

RELLIM.

Funeral of Perry E. Kimmell.

The funeral of Mr. Perry E. Kimmell occurred yesterday afternoon at two o'clock from the residence of Mrs. Bird Lake on Dewey avenue, West Side, where the remains had been taken shortly after death. Services were held in the Methodist Protestant church, of which Rev. C. L. Queen is pastor and were conducted by Rev. Queen and Rev. E. Berten Reese. The church and Sunday school rooms were packed with friends of the deceased who braved the mid-winter cold to pay a last tribute of respect to one who who was held in high esteem by every man, woman and child in Grafton who had become acquainted with him during his residence here. As the funeral cortege entered the church a choir of picked voices sang "Asleep in Jesus," and the service was opened with "Lead Kindly Light." Rev. Queen then delivered an earnest and pathetic prayer. He was followed by Rev. Reese, who in announcing the familiar hymn, "Jesus, Savior Pilot Me," described it as the favorite hymn of the deceased young man, sung recently by the speaker upon request of his now dead friend. After this hymn Rev. Reese spoke briefly, eloquently and most beautifully of his close friendly relations with Mr. Kimmell during the past two years; of the even tenor of the life of the deceased, the commendable principles of honesty, truthfulness and love that shone effulgent in his daily walk through life, and of the tender ties that had grown up between them as they were thrown much together. In his words of tender consolation to the bereaved relatives and friends, Rev. Reese conveyed an impressive message to all present. Rev. Reese was followed Rev. Queen in one of the most powerful sermons of the kind ever heard in Grafton. Rev. Queen, after delivering a beautiful eulogy on the life of the deceased, appealed in the strongest language possible to the many young men present to emulate the example of Mr. Kimmell and to live that when the hour of death draws nigh they too can look up and say they are not afraid to die and that "all is well." Following Rev. Queen's address Mrs. Frush and Miss Ada Bell sang "Sometime, Somewhere" as a duet. Opportunity was then given the friends to view the remains, and several hundred people passed up the aisle and alongside the casket. The remains were encased in a handsome black cloth-covered casket with side-length silver handles. There were eight beautiful floral offerings of sympathy, among them being several beautiful designs. The deceased had been a member of Vincent's band, and this organization sent a floral drum, composed of white carnations and dark green foliage. The band boys turned out in body, dressed in their uniforms, and eight of them acted as flower carriers. The pall bearers were Messrs Harry Abbott, Frank Nuzum, Bert Cuppett, Frank Hinkins, Bert and Edward Pratt, all of whom had been close friends of the deceased during his residence in this city. Interment was made in Bluemont cemetery, where the remains were tenderly laid to their last, long rest. The funeral was under direction of Undertaker Jno. A. McCabe. Among the out-of-town attendants at the funeral were Messrs. Thos. Kimmell of Fairmont, and William Kimmell of Thayerville, Md., the two surviving brothers of the deceased; Mr. and Mrs. Flowers of Belington, Mrs. Flowers being a sister; Messrs. A T. Dillard and Chas. E. Smith of Fairmont.—Friday's Grafton Sentinel.

Won $500 Cash Prize.

A five hundred dollar cash prize, the first prize offered by the Perry Mason Co., publishers of the Youth's Companion, has fallen as the good fortune to the efforts of Miss Sue Sheetz, of Keyser. In 1900 Miss Sheetz got in on the prize list and received as a reward $200. This time she got 161 new subscribers which carried the first prize.

First Quarter. Lesson V. Genesis viii, 1-16. February 3, 1907.

Noah Saved in The Ark.

In the incomparable picture-gallery of the Scriptures there is no canvas like that which presents the ark and the Flood. It is too bold and tragic to be passed. It arrests and stirs the most indolent mind. Once caught upon the sensitive plate of a child's memory, it will never fade. Its unspeakable horror is mercifully mitigated by such gentle incidents as the door shut by God's own hand, the dove with olive branch, and the rainbow spanning all.

The Noachian Deluge only precipitated the inevitable. It was an act of Divine mercy as well as justice. In the great conflict foretold in Eden between the serpent seed and the seed of God, the former were ascendant. The conditions were aggravated by intermarriage. The sons of God, the descendants of Seth, were lured by the siren daughters of Cain, so that they chose their wives irrespective of the Divine will. All the proverbial sin and sorrow of mesalliance followed. The very physical hardihood of the offspring made their moral obliquity more deadly. Every conceivable lust was rampant. The seed of God was reduced to a paltry contingent. It was on the verge of extinction. The whole race, in fact, was committing suicide. It was destroying itself. Earth would have soon been like a desolate island whose sanguinary population had consumed itself through lust, murder, and cannibalism.

The Flood was a great mercy. It shortened the irretrievable misery of the race then living. It kept the seed of God alive. It was an object-lesson the world has never forgotten.

God's election to salvation is based upon the moral qualities of those whom He chooses. There is striking illustration of this in the character of Noah. He found grace in the eyes of the Lord, not through caprice and favoritism, but because in a wicked and adulterous generation he shone like a light, and lovingly held forth to a dying race the word which, if received, would have proved life to them. He was a just man and upright, and walked with God. He was fit to be the second Adam, the progenitor of a new and hopeful race. And to this end God spared him.

Noah's faith shines resplendent upon the rayless irreligion of his day. He showed his faith by his stupendous work. On dry land and far from the sea he built his colossal ship. He preached righteousness to the gaping and gibing crowd which curiosity brought from afar to his shipyard. He was persisient. He kept right on building and preaching for one hundred and twenty years. He built precisely according to the model shown him. He gathered in the supply of food for man and beast requisite for his long voyage. He selected and admitted the beasts and fowl as God directed. With seven souls he entered his strange prison, had its doors shut to behind him by the the Invisible Hand, and tarried in his weird environment undaunted, though seven days passed before the first raindrop pattered upon the roof. Sublime faith, that!

The "log-book" of that unparallel voyage is very brief. It takes only twenty-seven verses to narrate the novel and thrilling experience of three hundred and sixty-five days. Much riches are in little room. Imagination must be trusted to uncover them.

As Noah at length emerged from the ark, an inexpressibly sad and and orphaned feeling must have affected his generous heart. Earth's desolation, how utter! In vain he listens for the sound of a human footfall. Not even a footprint is left. He finds relief in worship. He builds an altar on the dripping rocks of Ararat. Again his faith exemplifies itself. He had saved only a few specimens of clean animals; but he prepares to offer some of them, with full assurance that God would supply their places, and see that the species did not become extinct. When the fragrance of that whole burnt offering came up before the Lord, He knew that Noah intended it should signify the complete devotion of himself, his descendants, and the renewed earth to God.

As a pitying Father, God graciously responded to the suppliant patriarch, allaying his fears with the assurance that the cataclysm just passed should never be repeated; the beneficent regularity of the seasons should know no interruption, human life should have a safeguard. God delegates His judicial power to man to this end. The first principle of human government is here irradiated in the statute, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed."

The Noachian covenant was now ready for its seal. God took the very substance which had destroyed the earth, and transmuted it into a royal signet to attest His promise never again to whelm the race. There it stood in all the dazzling splendor of its prismatic colors—an arrowless bow, bent toward heaven, the very vastness of its sweep signifying the "wideness of God's mercy." To all generations the ineffable and assuring words which first fell upon Noah's ears have resounded, "This is the token of the covenant."

The Teacher's Lantern.

Rivet fidgety scholars this paragraph certainly will; it is so scenic. It fairly teaches itself. The natural method is superlative wickedness which made that wholesale destruction an act of mercy as well as of justice; how the irretrievable misery of the human family, which had doomed itself, was cut short, and a chance given to begin anew under happier auspices.

* * * * *

Noah's upright character can be made to shine against the universal degeneracy of his times. It proves one can be good in spite of one's environment. A boy can keep his lips unsullied, though the air around him is blue with profanity. He need not lie, nor cheat, nor gamble, though those with whom he is thrown in school, shop or store all do. If he keep upright, he will prove God's instrument of good to his fellows.

* * * * *

Implicit and persistent was Noah's obedience. He showed his faith by his works. He never grew weary in well-doing under circumstances calculated to try him to the uttermost. So his name richly deserves to be engraven on that tall obelisk, Hebrew xi, reared to the heroes of faith. His very character and course was in itself an indictment and condemnation of the world before the Flood.

* * * * *

Heir to two worlds, Noah stepped out of the ark sole monarch and proprietor of all he surveyed with the natural eye, and beyond that the better inheritance, even the heavenly. So God rewards—a hundred-fold in this life, and in the world to come life everlasting.

* * * * *

A bone of contention has ever been the question whether the Flood was universal or not. The arguments pro: (1) Natural conclusion from the language of Scripture. (2) No evidence to prove that the population of earth was confined to a limited locality. (3) Impossibility of piling the waters up in such manner as to cover the mountains. (4) No need of taking birds into the ark, if Deluge was only local. Arguments Contra: (1) Universal Deluge unnecessary to accomplish the end designed. (2) Ark could not have given room for every species. (3) To cover highest mountains, water must needs be five miles deep. Ten miles added to the diameter of earth would destroy the equipoise of the system. (4) Universal prevalence would have produced change of climate. (5) Overflowing of salt water would destroy plant life, and fresh water animal life.

* * * * *

Still pending is the case, with the drift of the best modern comment however decidedly in favor of a local Deluge. The rocks bear the incontroyertible testimony to the possibility and reality of such a Flood as Genesis describes. Huxley, in his Lay Sermon, No. IX, graphically describes such a cataclysm. M. Figuier affirms that the Asiatic Deluge occurred after the appearance of man. A vulgar infidelity has had its laugh at Noah and his ark; but he laughs best who laughs last.

* * * * *

Corresponding to the testimony of the rocks is the testimony of tradition. Humbolt says that ancient traditions of the Flood are dispersed over the whole surface of the globe.

ODD TREASURES OF A TOWN.

One reads of romantic castles of silver and palaces of gold, but they are the dreams of fiction—now they have discovered something as strange on the map of Mexico. The buildings of a whole town have been bought at so much per ton, based on assays from the adobe walls which give gold and silver values. This town is Guanajuato's suburb, Tepetapa, at a value of $30,000 Mexican currency.

The value of this little town was revealed when the Mexican Central decided to build into the city of Guanajuato and to establish a station there, running into the heart of the town.

It was found necessary to tear down about three hundred buildings which had been built of the slimes produced by the grinding of ores from the numerous mines of the districts. Straw was mixed with the slime and in this way the adobe bricks were made.

When it became known that the Central would have to tear down these houses an enterprising ore-buying company asked for permission to assay ore taken from the buildings. This was granted and samples were picked from the walls at various heights and on various sides of the buildings, the assays running in value from $3 to $24 per ton in gold and silver. The values averaged $8 gold per ton.

As the buildings were built in various bonanza epochs, it was found that the values varied to a large extent. For instance, a wall on one side of a house would assay a low value, whereas a wall on the other side, built at an earlier or later time, would assay a high value. A man's kitchen might assay 50 cents per ton and his parlor $50.

That the walls are found to contain more gold than silver values is due to the fact that the old patio process of treating the ores was more effective in extracting silver than gold values and the slimes left were richer in gold than silver. It will be harder to build such a town in the future, as the camp is now fitted out with modern appliances for treating ores.

THE DRAMA OF POCAHONTAS.

The Sentiment and Artistic Triumph of Jamestown Exposition.

Where is the man asks the New York "World," who shall write a serious literary drama of high character around the period of the settlement of English speaking America?

The answer is here. The drama has been written.

The legendary romance and the poetical sentiment of American history is almost exclusively involved in the history of the American Indian, and nowhere have these singularly interesting people played a more important part than in the events which the forthcoming Jamestown Exposition is designed to honor and memorialize. Peculiarly appropriate, therefore, to the sentiment of the occasion is any feature giving place or prominence to the American Indian, and in the elegant and pretentious drama of "Pocahontas" written by George F. Viett, of Norfolk, and designed especially for presentation during the period of the great celebration, the promoters believe, and with the best of reasons to support their belief, that they will present to the American public America's greatest drama. That it will prove the artistic triumph of the Jamestown Exposition is conceded by all who have read the manuscript, for the work has been written with a view to establishing a permanent and artistic success in the dramatic world, and is not of the ephemeral burlesque order designed solely to gather the pitiful pennies of a festival period.

This great historical play embodies the scenes and covers the events and incidents of the settlement at Jamestown, reviving upon the stage the characters and the doings of that eventful and stirring epoch in a manner beyond question the most unique and original ever presented. From a literary viewpoint there has certainly been no drama yet written on this side that will approach it. From the dramatic standpoint it possesses all the power and impressiveness that the incidents of a striking and romantic period afford.

Tragic, dramatic and striking beyond compare, signalizing as it does the birth of a great Nation, the settlement of Virginia by the English in 1607 sets forth a great historic panorama that must forever stand eminently apart in solitary grandeur among the pictures of time. The muse of dramatic poetry has yet to glorify this theme, and to this grateful task the labors of the present dramatist have been devoted. There was but one Jamestown and there is but one America, and to do honor and justice to both, to revive the heroic figures and the splendid pictures of a splendid age, to signalize with living glory the just renown of the mother country, and to clothe with the mantle of idealism that which is truly romantic is the purpose of the play of "Pocahontas." Considered solely from a spectacular standpoint, this drama properly could be equaled by few of the great stage spectacles heretofore presented and excelled by none. It has for its setting a double background of seventeenth century civilized magnificence and the savage solemnity of a new world's fastnesses, the latter animated by the figures of barbaric, but as interesting and peculiar a people as the muse of history ever looked upon. In this splendid framing a great world drama was enacted. To attempt to handle so grand, so inspiring and so lofty a subject through the medium of an extravaganza or comic opera, as was at one time proposed, would be nothing short of sacrilege, a profanation of the consecrated memories of the Nation and an affront to the sensibilities of the intelligent. Burlesque and farce had no warrant here, and to give to this renowned and imperishable story a dignity befitting its exalted position in history has been Mr. Viett's aim, one to which he has devoted a scrupulous, a chivalrous and a poetic devotion. To those even but faintly familiar with the history of the settlement of Virginia it will be readily apparent that the background, the incidents, and the characters connected with that impressive event contain in themselves every requisite element of a grand spectacular and inspiring production, so much so, indeed, that a mere skeleton of vertebrae would suffice to carry the play through a financial success. Mr. Viett has dressed this glowing picture with a dialogue of Shakesperean elegance. Historically correct in every essential detail, the language of "Pocahontas" is of a poetical refinement bordering on the classical.

The play is in four acts and an epilogue. The entire first act is set in England, the curtain rising upon a farewell gathering of the Virginia adventurers at the Mermaid Inn, in London, on the night prior to the departure. In this act the playwright has introduced the character of William Shakespeare, the great dramatist, who delivers a farewell address to the assemblage. This is of course a piece of dramatic license, but one for which may be advanced the double claim of probability and consistency backed by authentic historical suggestion. This suggestion is taken from Cooke's History of Virginia, in which that historian infers the acquaintance of Shakespeare with Captain John Smith and others of the adventurers. Around the majestic figure of the poet king the literary excellence of the drama is portrayed, and in his daring venture of placing words in the mouth of the world's greatest genius, Mr. Viett has aimed at a reputation that can rest upon no middle ground, but must find its place at either end of the line of literary endeavor. Able critics assert that the address of Shakespeare in the drama of Pocahontas is a literary masterpiece and not unworthy of him who is supposed to utter it. The second act opens upon a purely American scene, making a striking contrast to the setting of the first. In the virgin American forest Chief Opechancanough, of the Pamaunkee tribe of Indians, is holding a council deliberative to the recent landing of the English at Jamestown, some miles away. Pocahontas, or Mataoka, the daughter of Powhatan, appears in this scene. The council resolves that the English be exterminated and closes with a war dance.

The next scene presents Jamestown and the entrance of Pocahontas, who warns the colonists of the impending attack. The attack follows and the Indians are repulsed. The other climaxes of this act are the trial and acquittal of Smith, the first on American soil; the treachery of Ratcliffe and Wingfield and the trial and condemnation of Kendall. In the third act the capture of Smith by Opechancanough is shown, his trial before the council of Powhatan and the thrilling climax of his saving by Pocahontas. Not the least difficulty in the building of this drama has been the delineation of the Indian character through the medium of the dialogue. The sternness, directness and eloquence of Indian speech has been faithfully portrayed by the playwright and for the first time in the history of the American stage the American Indian has been given place in a high legitimate drama and clothed with the dignity to which his character and history entitle him. Act fourth eight years later transfers the scene to the court of King James. The pomp and ceremony of the court with the presence of Pocahontas and other Indians cannot fail to present an uncommon and beautiful picture to an audience. The dialogue of this act is in keeping with its spectacular splendor.

The drama ends with the arrival of the maids at Jamestown in 1621. This is handled through the medium of a grand musical ballet in which colonists, Indians and allegorical figures make up a fitting finale.

EASTON'S PLANT WORN OUT.

Rundown Machinery and Dark Streets. Appeal to Corporations.

Easton, Pa., is one of the cities that, having tried municipal ownership of lighting plants, have found it wanting. In a recent message to the city councils Mayor March said that, although he is a believer in the theory of city ownership, nevertheless he would "prefer to hand over the city lighting to private corporations rather than see large districts in darkness as has often been the case in the [illegible]."

Continuing, he characterized this as "dangerous from the point of view" and unbecoming the citizen's, adding that [illegible] continues to operate the plant it be run as a private corporation would run it." There should not only be economy, but the machinery should be constantly repaired and renewed, both for efficiency and "to keep up with modern progress in electric lighting."

Much of the machinery being almost worn out, he advises that arrangements be made to borrow current from a local company in case of breakdown that the city streets may not be kept in darkness while repairs are going on. He does not say what he would advise were municipal ownership complete and there were no private companies.

Built in 1886, the construction cost of Easton's electric light plant to date has been about $70,000. In a summary of the situation the Sunday Call, which appears originally to have favored the enterprise, says the plant isn't satisfactory and the city hasn't the money to renew it. The companies must now be asked to put in bids for city lighting. The Call thinks they can furnish it cheaper than the city can itself. Easton's lighting experiment, the paper adds, "has been costly and unsatisfactory." The city was bonded to establish the plant, and now that it is worn out and almost useless the debt remains.

Nothing has ever been charged up for depreciation, but the people were told that this was unnecessary, as the plant was being kept in good repair. Fifty thousand dollars was spent in "patching up" the plant, but the statement that it was kept in good order is now proved untrue, and so is the statement that the cost was less than a private corporation would have charged for the same service, though many people believed both statements for a time.

According to a special to the New York Times, women and children are not considered safe on Easton's streets at night, and sixty firms and business men have petitioned that the street lighting be turned over to a private corporation at once.

THE FUNNY SIDE OF M. O.

Politics In City Departments—A Queer Veto—City Poles Downed.

Public Service is not a humorous publication, but there were some funny items in its December issue. Commenting on the proposition of the Business Men's club of Cincinnati that civil service rules should be introduced into the municipal department, Mr. Miller, a member of the board of public service, is quoted as saying, "I think the first requisite for a good official is that he should be a good Democrat."

The mayor of Bluffton, Ind., is more subtly humorous. He advocates municipal ownership as an antidote for monopoly and then vetoes a franchise for a gas plant because it would compete with the municipal electric light works and "probably would reduce the city's $40,000 plant to a mass of junk." This is rather more than a tacit admission that the consumers are paying through the nose.

But the funniest thing of all is that some of the citizens of Chicago had to go to law to compel the city electrical department to obey its own laws. Because such construction is much cheaper this department undertook to erect poles in a district where the ordinances require wires to be placed underground. The citizens appealed to the department to protect them from what they assumed to be the intrusion of a private company. Instead of being allayed their indignation was rather increased when they learned their mistake, and they did not stop until the city council passed an ordinance requiring the removal of the poles.

Municipal Wages In England.

As the result of an application from employees for an increase of wages, the Salford (England) tramways committee has recommended to the municipality, which owns and operates the line, that the wages of conductors be raised to 11 cents per hour on appointment, 12 cents per hour after one year of service and 13 cents per hour after three years of service. Another municipality advertises for a car shed night foreman at $9 per week.—Electrical World.

Ashtabula's Disastrous Experience.

The city council of Ashtabula, O., recently passed an ordinance directing that the municipal electric light plant be sold to the highest bidder. The plant began operation [illegible] construction cost of [illegible] which $50,000 is [illegible] loss owing to the [illegible] allowed to [illegible] ated on most liberal [illegible] age cost of [illegible] cess of $100,0[illegible]

When to Know.

A good time to know [illegible] of municipal ownership [illegible] is when he is about to [illegible] tax collector's office. He can then see what would happen to him if he became a joint owner in the whole thing.—Exchange.

That Speech of Barney's

By Ina Wright Hanson

Copyright, 1906, by Ina Wright Hanson

Had Irinda been beautiful or had she known that there were times when she was very charming indeed it never would have happened.

Irinda's worst fault was morbidness when she remembered that she was sallow and pale eyed and had sandy hair when she would have preferred pink and white complexion, dark eyes and golden hair. She would have added dimples and beautifully arched eyebrows, too, if she could have had her way about it. As a matter of fact, it was only when she was remembering her ugliness that she really was ugly. Her face in her times of forgetting pictured quite pleasantly her pure spirit and loving heart.

Irinda and a jolly lot of other music lovers were on a train bound for San

HER EYES WANDERED TO THE OPPOSITE SIDE OF THE CAR.

Francisco and a week of grand opera. Jim, her satellite, was along, not because he appreciated grand opera, but because he appreciated Irinda.

So much for the hero and heroine. Next the villain, to whom his Celtic mother had given a ravishing pair of blue eyes and a tongue tuned to soft words. Barney was not a villainous villain at all—just a warm hearted boy who loved everybody and wanted to be loved by everybody in turn. He must have the villain's part because there cannot be a second hero and because—But you shall see.

As the train sped along Jim went to the smoker—not to smoke, for he had never learned how, but because he feared Irinda might be tiring of him. Barney immediately took his place.

Soon after a lady and gentleman boarded the train. As Irinda's seat had been turned so that her back was toward the engine, the newcomers were in full view of her. The lady bent her head, and some rice fell from her smart brown turban. The gentleman smiled, and the lady's cheeks went red as roses. Then she opened her magazine and tried to look unconscious.

"Oh, Barney," breathed Irinda, "isn't the bride lovely? Do look at that butterfly in her veil just at the corner of her sweet red mouth! See that perfect curve from her forehead to her chin as she looks out the window. Now, quick, Barney, she is turning to her husband. See her beautiful eyes. They're as brown as her dainty hat."

Barney's ravishing eyes glanced at the beautiful lady, Barney's quick mind took in the situation, and Barney's warm heart rose to the occasion. Smilingly he turned to Irinda.

"Why, I never think of a woman's looks, whether she has a pretty face or not. That doesn't appeal to me. When I know a woman she attracts me or not according to whether or not she has magnetism. Magnetism is as good a name as any other for what no one understands. But, believe me, Irinda, magnetism is the charm of a woman, not a pretty face."

Barney's blue eyes said so much more than his tongue, rolling ever so slightly his "r's," that Irinda's colorless face flushed becomingly. The eyes said that she, Irinda Bowen, had the magnetism, or whatever it was, and that it had never occurred to Barney whether or not she was pretty.

Happy thoughts fluttered around Irinda for the rest of the journey. Barney left her, and Jim came back. She smiled at him. He didn't know it was an impersonal smile, born of Barney's words. She remembered the day when she had cried out fiercely at her lack of beauty, and Jim had answered:

"What difference does it make what you look like? You are always beautiful to me, Irinda."

He never knew why she had pushed him away when he would have put his arms around her. Stupid old Jim couldn't know that he had made a tacit acknowledgment of her ugliness, while Barney—why, Barney had never thought anything about it.

Grand opera week went by in a diapason of glory. Irinda was wonderfully happy, and every day she told herself shyly and with many blushes how much she was caring for Barney. It was not till they were homeward bound that the tragedy happened.

The tragedy? No, it was not the train leaving the rails and plunging down an embankment. It was only Barney's pleasant voice, rolling ever so slightly his r's—it was only Barney making this remark to Alderly, the chaperon's husband:

"I have been noticing the ladies in this car, and I don't believe I ever saw so many beautiful ones together. Don't you know it is rare to find a really beautiful woman? If her eyes are fine, something is wrong with her chin; if her nose"

Irinda felt sick and voluntarily closed her ears, while Barney seemed to leave its horizon. Barney, who never thought of a woman's looks, was discussing woman's beauty. He had not meant what he had said to her at all.

Irinda felt very much as she had when some one told her that George Washington and his little hatchet and William Tell and the apple were probably only pleasant stories, at the same time she was suddenly conscious that she did not love and never had loved Barney. Her eyes wandered to the opposite side of the car, where Jim sat alone. A little flicker of sunshine was touching his brown hair with gold. Irinda, with a quick indrawing of her breath, remembered that it had looked just so the morning her mother died.

The doctor had told them—her father and herself—that the sick one could not live through the day, and he had gone away and left them to their sorrow. Miserably father and daughter had communed together. She must be told, but each shrank from the telling. Just then Jim had come. He had been like a son to Irinda's mother, and they relegated the task to him, knowing that Jim never had shirked a duty in his life.

She remembered how he had gone about it—not smoothing over the sad facts at all, but with eyes and manner and words so full of sympathy and tenderness and stanch hope of the unknown future that death seemed to lose something of its dread. And as she, at the foot of the bed, had lifted up her tear stained face she saw a ray of sunlight touch Jim's hair just as it was doing now.

She tried to picture Barney in the death chamber. He would not have lacked in sympathy, but he would have tried to bring encouragement where no encouragement could be. She drew contrasts as she watched the brown hair turning golden—contrasts between foam of the sea and the cool blue depths of the ocean itself, between a bending reed and a sturdy pine, between irresponsibility and true heartedness. Then she went over to the seat where Jim sat alone. The face he turned toward her startled her with its sternness.

"Irinda, I have loved you for a long time, but you've always put me off from telling you. It may as well be settled now and forever. I want you for my wife, and I'll do my best to make you happy. I don't want any trifling, child. Just plain yes or no."

"Jim, if you really want any one so selfish and ugly and foolish as I am I'm sure you're more than welcome. I'm not worthy to be your wife, though," she replied humbly.

"Thou art all that is fair to me, my beloved."

Jim's voice was hushed as one who prays. His eyes, looking down reverently at his little sweetheart, were wondrous in their great happiness, and Irinda, though tearful, smiled contentedly in answer.

Organ Grinder's Winter Resort.

The organ grinders of America, no less than the millionaires, have their winter resort. The organ grinders' winter resort is Italy, the Italian Riviera, and every boat that sails for Naples or Genoa in the late autumn has a steerage crowded with organ grinders. These men do so well in the spring and summer that they can afford a winter at home. Their home is a lovely one, far different from what they would get if they stayed in America. They sit at home on ancient stone benches in the sunny squares of little mountain towns. Behind them rise in the blue and gold air the pale pinnacles of the Maritime Alps. Before them, but far below, stretches the blue and glistening floor of the sea, with tiny ships coming and going. Yes, it is very pleasant for the organ grinders at home. Palms bloom everywhere. Oranges, yellow as gold, shine among the foliage. The air is sweet with the perfume of the great rose and violet farms that feed the voracious perfume factories of Grasse. And it is cheap. For 10 or 15 cents a day an organ grinder can be as happy in his winter resort as the millionaire can be in his for $10 or $15.

President Tyler's Fensis.

President Tyler's dinners were, on a large scale, those of a wealthy Virginia planter, and as the greater part of the provisions came from his own plantation at Greenway Court they tickled the palates of the most exacting epicure. He employed a negro cook from his old home, one who knew how to do to a turn fried chicken and to shave off the delicious pink slices of baked ham. These hams were considered the finest that ever graced a table, and the Virginia porkers of today, famed the world over, might well pride themselves on their noble ancestry, that were as carefully prepared for the table as a thoroughbred horse for a race. For six months they were let run wild in the oak woods to feed off acorns, supplemented by a little corn in the morning and evening. When they were in their second autumn they were turned into the cornfield after the harvest, then let run in the loosely harvested fields of black eyed peas, after which they were fed on selected corn until shortly before the holidays, when they were killed, then smoked for several months by hickory chips and finally rubbed down well with moist brown sugar.—Home Magazine.

A Long Wait.

"What was the trouble with that customer?" asked the florist.

"He wanted to know something about that small century plant," replied the assistant.

"What of it?"

"Well, he wanted to know if it would bloom when it was a hundred years old. I said it would. Then he asked how old it was, and I told him it was two years old."

"Well?"

"He said he guessed he wouldn't wait to see it bloom."—Judge.

Choice of Evils.

"People have asked a great many questions about how you got your money."

"Yes?" answered the ex-boss.

"But you have managed to hold on to it and to enjoy it."

"I have. Explaining how you got wealth isn't as bad as wondering how you let it get away."—Washington Star.

Sloggs (son of the middleweight champion)—Yes, sir. It's because you're a heavyweight and I'm only a bantam.

All Round the Clock.

"Grandpa says his stay in the mountains did him no good. His room was right off the piazza and people made love under his window until all hours."

"But couldn't he sleep after the lovers went to bed?"

"No. As soon as the lovers went to bed the children got up."—Harper's Weekly.

Why?

Father (after a long search for a book)—Well, here it is. I wonder why one always finds a thing in the last place in which one hunts?

Son—I expect it's because when we find what we are looking for we stop hunting.—Pearson's Weekly.

Mr. Bowser Goes Hunting

Expected to Shoot Rabbits, but Has a Battle With Farmers and a Dog.

COMES HOME A WRECK

As Usual, Blames His Wife For Misfortunes and Says She Tried to Get Him Killed.

[Copyright, 1906, by C. H. Sutcliffe.]

WHEN breakfast was announced the other morning Mr. Bowser still lingered upstairs, and it was not until he was twenty minutes late that he appeared. Then, to Mrs. Bowser's surprise, he was dressed in a hunting suit, and his demeanor was that of a Nimrod.

"What on earth does this mean?" she asked as she got her breath.

"Have you forgotten the day?" he queried in reply. "This is the day when I always hie me forth to the country to take my annual rabbit hunt. Just enough snow fell last night for good tracking."

"But where did you get that suit?"

"Had it in the house for a month."

"Are you going to hunt rabbits with a sand bag?"

"Scarcely, my dear. I have a thirty dollar shotgun upstairs."

"Well, your rabbits will cost you about $10 apiece, but I've got nothing to say. I know how it will all come out, however."

"My dear woman, I need a day off. I need some excitement. I dote on rabbit pie. I love to trail the hare to his den. This outfit is rather costly, but I figure that I will make up for it in increased health and spirits. There is nothing so bracing as the early winter air in the country. I am told that it is no trick at all for a good shot to knock over 200 rabbits in a day. If I can market 175, it will half pay for my outfit."

Mrs. Bowser Apprehensive.

"But things will happen, and you will come home mad and talk about my trying to assassinate you," protested Mrs. Bowser. "When you went last year"—

"My dear woman," he interrupted, "there is nothing to happen. No one will come home mad. When I ring the bell, come to the door and gaze upon a wagon load of rabbits."

What was the use of saying any more? Mr. Bowser had planned to go, would go, and words were simply wasted in seeking to turn him aside. He might by accident or otherwise manage to kill one poor little rabbit, and, if so, it would make him good natured for a week. He cut his breakfast short that he might make a start, and he was in jovial spirits as he pranced up the street with a shotgun on his shoulder to take a suburban car to the scene of conflict. There was only one other passenger at that early hour. He was a farmer who had come into town the day before for a pound of baking powder and got things mixed up and drank a pint of whisky instead. He was going home mad about it, and when Mr. Bowser got on the car he growlingly asked:

"What brass band do you belong to, old man?"

"This is my hunting costume," was the reply from the good feeling Nimrod.

"Oh! What the devil are you going to hunt for—cockroaches?"

"Rabbits, my friend."

"Humph! Some men never get over being fools!"

Strikes a Track at Once.

Mr. Bowser whistled and smiled and refused to get vexed or to hold any more conversation and in due time was landed out among the farmers. The fields lay before him broad and white, and he climbed a fence and made for a bit of woods. He had heard that, while alligators preferred water, rabbits took to the woods for choice. He had hardly reached the first tree when he found himself in luck. There were tracks right under his eyes, and he felt his pulses bound with excitement.

He could not be mistaken.

Some beast had passed that way.

The trail was red hot.

The instinct of the hunter was strong upon Mr. Bowser. He crouched low and followed the tracks, with his eyes scanning the woods ahead of him and his gun ready for instant use.

Only a hunter knows the thrill of such a moment.

The game may be uncovered at any instant, or the snapping of a twig may send it bounding away in wild alarm.

As carefully as a Pawnee on the trail of a scalp Mr. Bowser moved forward. After he had gone a quarter of a mile he saw that the tracks grew fresher, and he could plainly observed the initials "K. Y. E. P." After a moment's thought he knew that these stood for "Keep your eye peeled," and he redoubled his vigilance. It was rewarded as he turned the next thicket. Something bellowed and bounded away from him. He threw up his gun and fired, and after the smoke blew away he saw a calf standing and facing him fifty feet away. In his ardor to get that wagon load of rabbits Mr. Bowser had not stopped to be critical about tracks. With a heart full of thankfulness that Mrs. Bowser was not there and would never know about it, he passed on. Five minutes later he found other tracks.

He couldn't be fooled again.

Here was real game afoot.

Every print of the foot had the letter "R" branded in it, and "R" stands for rabbit, even in the new way of spelling.

Mr. Bowser took up the trail with fresh ardor. He followed it through thickets and over logs and across frozen ponds, and directly he found that it led across a meadow straight for a farmer's barn. He had only to recall his boyhood days to realize that rabbits and barns are inseparably connected. The barn was the lair of the beast, and he should be dragged forth and slaughtered without mercy.

Clinging to the trail like a savage wolf to the footprints of a wounded buffalo, Mr. Bowser eventually reached the barn. In the open door in the winter's sunshine a cat sat licking her paws. Had Mr. Bowser been given five minutes in which to think it over, he would have connected the cat and the tracks and the barn together, but while he was looking from one to the other and scratching his head a farmer and his two grown sons appeared in the door back of the cat. The farmer's dog also appeared, coming from the house, and, feeling that he had been remiss in his vigilance, he made up for it now by nipping Mr. Bowser in the leg.

"By thunder!" exclaimed the Nimrod as he drew up his gun to shoot.

"Hold on, there!" cried the three men in chorus as they rushed out.

"You are a nice sort of man to keep such a cur around!" stormed Mr. Bowser, with all his joviality vanished.

"What in the devil do you suppose I keep a dog for except to bite tramps?" retorted the farmer.

"I am no tramp, as you very well know. Sir, there is a law against keeping savage dogs, and I want damages or I will appeal to it. Who is to say that this bite won't give me hydrophobia?"

Ordered Off the Farm.

"And who is to care whether it does or not? What right have you got trespassing on my land? What are you doing here, dressed up like some dime museum freak? By John, if you are not over the fence in two minutes me and the boys will throw you over!"

There could be but one ending to the situation.

Mr. Bowser had tracked a calf.

He had tracked a cat.

He had been bitten by a dog without excuse.

His face got red, and his gorge rose. His eyes snapped, and his ears worked. He would have taken it out on Mrs. Bowser if he could, but she was far away, and the farmers were near by. He drew a long breath and told the three of them and the dog to go to that place where you don't have to buy coal in the winter, and next minute the conflict was on. Mr. Bowser was rolled in the snow. He was punched in the eye and on the nose. The farmers tore and rent his hunting suit. They almost husked him, as they would have an ear of corn. True, he fought back and left scars behind him, but he had to go. He had to go on the run. Even after the men got tuckered out the dog kept him going for a spell. He reached home three hours earlier than was expected, and there was a stern dignity about him as he stood before Mrs. Bowser.

"Well, I see that you got a wagon load of something else," she observed.

"And how? And why? Who put up the little job? Who planned to spoil my day? Woman, look me in the eye and answer my questions!"

"I told you you would lay it to me if anything happened."

"Would be assassinist!" he hissed, and after gazing at her for a minute with folded arms he walked, one—two—three, down the hall and upstairs.

EXTREME CENTRALIZATION NOT POSSIBLE.

Taking recent utterances of President Roosevelt and Secretary of State Root in favor of enlargement of the powers of the General Government, as a sort of text, Hon. Wm. Pinkney Whyte, U. S. Senator from Maryland, made a carefully prepared speech on the floor of the Senate on Friday last in advocacy of the maintenance of States' Rights. As was fitting, the venerable Senator was listened to with respectful attention, and nearly all the Senators were present during the delivery of the speech.

Senator Whyte expressed alarm lest a growing tendency to centralization may deprive the States of the rights reserved to them by the Constitution, through judicial interpretations of that instrument less strict than is warranted by its terms, the President and Secretary having intimated that the changed conditions of the times has given rise to questions which cannot be dealt with by the States separately and which can only be met successfully by a liberal construction of the organic law of the whole country.

The Senator's alarm may be natural to a believer in extreme States' Rights, and to one who looks upon this great country as a mere Federation and claims that it is in no sense a nation. But there can be no doubt that in many contingencies the government must and always has acted as a National Power.

Senator Whyte has simply revived the old contention between Republicans and Federalists—that is between the followers of Jefferson and Madison on one hand and Washington, Hamilton and Marshall on the other. The Federalists favored a strong central government and the Republicans opposed. Time has at least demonstrated the necessity of such central authority as was conferred by the Constitution, and questions are now and again arising in which only such central authority can be exerted successfully for the benefit of the people. The creation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the passage of the railroad rate law, the pure food, law etc., are all measures that could have no effective existence if solely dependant upon State action. They are predicated upon the authority conferred by the Constitution upon the General Government to regulate commerce between the States, and the laws referred to will probably stand the test of constitutionality in the Supreme Court, the opinion of Senator Foraker to the contrary notwithstanding. They are certainly less centralizing than the government ownership of railroads, advocated by Mr. Wm. J. Bryan, the idol of a large portion of the Democratic party, would be. They do not trench upon States' Rights or, if otherwise, will be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. That Court will never be so constituted that it will, by its decisions, deprive the States of the rights now reserved to them by the Constitution. There can be no reasonable fear of serious encroachment upon the rights of the States through decisions of this great national tribunal.

It is certain, too, that no change in the Constitution calculated to abridge existing rights of the States can be made. The refusal of twelve States to consent to a change of that character would be sufficient to defeat it.

Then, it must be remembered that to effect such change would require the support of 258 of the 386 Representatives in Congress of any proposition for the amendment of the National Constitution and, after that, the concurrence of three-fourths of all the States.

We do not believe that with all these obstacles in the way of interference with the existing rights of the States there is any danger of their serious infringement by the General Government. Such domestic concerns as public schools cannot be forced to receive objectionable pupils under the treaty making power of the Executive. There is no danger that the votes of two-thirds of the Senators could be obtained to sanction a treaty embracing such a provision, and, if such a thing were possible, the Supreme Court would promptly declare the treaty to be in contravention of the right of the States to regulate their own domestic concerns.

The alarm of Senator Whyte is therefore not well founded and the people of the country may rest quietly in the assurance that their rights are not in danger of invasion by the General Government. Extreme centralization is not possible under any conditions that can arise, short of revolution.

FOXTOWN.

We are glad to say at this writing the mud has frozen up and snow enough has fallen to make sleighing good. The young people are making good use of it.

A literary will be held in the school house Friday evening, Feb. 1. All are cordially invited to come.

The Garrett Lumber Company mill shut down on account of the cold weather and quite a number of men are out of employment, but they hope to start up soon.

Quite a number of young people gathered on Monday eve and serenaded A. C. Ober, but he did not seem to appreciate the honor bestowed.

The farmers of this section are busy hauling coal.

Mrs. Chris. Klotz is seriously ill at this writing.

Messrs. John Detrick, J. L. Durst, H. L. Custer and Miss Lavina Detrick, of Jennings, and Messrs. James K. Stark and T. M. Turney, of this place, made a flying trip to Oakland Tuesday of this week to attend a law suit.

BITTINGER.

For three days the mercury has been hovering near the zero point and the first ideal winter period of the season is here for our enjoyment, and the merry jingle of sleigh bells may be heard on every hand, brightening the winter scene with their cheerful music.

The good ladies of the Lutheran congregation of this village held an oyster supper last Saturday evening and we learn had a pleasant and successful evening.

W. L. Thomas, principal of our public school, attended the local teachers' institute at Friendsville last Friday and Saturday.

Mrs. Christian Klotz, of near this place, is seriously ill at this writing. She is attended by Dr. Boyer of Accident.

J. L. Beachy, who has been employed in the mines at Listonburg, Pa., is here this week.

George Yommer and family, of Jennings, were visiting Mrs. Yommer's mother, Mrs. K. A. Bittinger, in this settlement, last Saturday and Sunday.

Sheriff Albert Lee, of Oakland, passed through here last Saturday and favored us with a pleasant call.

Simon Orendorf, a young man from this settlement, who is contracting over near Springs, Pa., had his left hand badly mashed last week by a heavy piece of timber falling upon it.

The superstitious are busy with speculations as to the probability of the ground hog seeing his shadow on his hogship's day.

NEW GERMANY.

As we are expected to make some comment about the weather we will only say that we won't complain because good and bad weather all come from the same source.

Miss Jenny Jenkins is staying with her sister at Johnstown.

Those who attended the funeral of Tina Garlitz last Wednesday from this place were Messrs. Ross, Asa and James Durst and Misses Cora, Sadie and Dora Durst.

"Hil" Warnick, the professional cook, is home on a furlough.

Mrs. Henry Broadwater has been critically ill for some weeks but we are glad to hear she is convalescing slowly.

Among those who attended the oyster supper at Bittinger last Saturday night were Olan Broadwater and sister Cora, Clarence Glotfelty and Olan Warnick. They report a fine time and lots of oysters.

Our school mistress, Miss Anna Riley, attended the teachers institute at Sutton last Saturday.

Burglars entered the store of Judge Merrill, of Merrill, one night last week, securing about $17 in money, postage stamps and notions amounting in all, we understand, to about $50. The burglars were tracked in the snow and certain parties are suspected of the crime.

The revival held at this place some weeks ago by Rev. T. McCoy was the nearest approach to the old time revivals that has been held here for years.

A shoe factory burned in Boston last night and 2,000 soles were lost, but all the heels were saved.

Miss Sadie Durst, who has been employed in Meyersdale, is at home.

The telephone service was impaired by the high winds last week.

Messrs. Call and Thompson were the guests of C. J. Otto Sunday last.

Herman Robinson, of Avilton, was in our vicinity Sunday soliciting money in behalf of an unfortunate lady. Donations were given liberally.

Our school is progressing nicely having an enrollment of 26.

James T. Durst was visiting his sister, Mrs. Garlitz, last Sunday.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

All articles intended for publication in this column must be mailed to the Teachers' Association, Oakland, Md.

The following articles have been received for publication in the series:

WHO IS THE BACK-BONE OF THE SCHOOL?

Upon whom rests the greatest responsibility for the success of our schools? We shall try to find the answer to this question by the method of elimination; that is, by showing how it does not rest upon certain individuals with the conclusion finally that we shall know precisely the people who do hold in their hands the success of the school.

The responsibility does not reat upon the teacher, striking as such a statement may seem. They are partly his—these responsibilities—but only a very small part. The teacher feels that his duties are to give satisfaction to the school board. Should that body not be pleased with his efforts the teacher knows that he would soon be struck off the pay roll. The school board, to the teachers of this county, is the most important factor in our educational system.

Some saintly people say that a teacher should not teach for money; some teachers boastingly say the same. These sentiments, however, are exceedingly hollow: they are founded upon mere theory and not upon stern facts. Cut off the salary and how long will the teacher teach the school? Furthermore, to whom does the teacher look for an example of the person who works for nothing? Is it the farmer? the laborer? the banker? or to the store.keeper? Nay, not to them, nor to anyone else, for no one in this day of heavy expenses work for nothing. On the contrary, the teacher wants as large a salary as it is possible for him to get. The school board gives the salary. To please the board, therefore, is the aim of every teacher who is worth his hire. As a result of this salary the teacher feels some little responsibility to the school; but the greater part of the responsibility is to the school board which gives him the wherewithal to buy his food and clothing. These thoughts may not be the most pleasant for the parents or others to read; nevertheless they are facts, and facts are what make the world go.

Next week another short article will appear which will attempt to prove that the responsibility of the success of the school does not depend upon the trustees. Lack of space prevents it this week.

CONTRIBUTION No. 7.

THE FUNCTION OF BOOKS.

School text books should be servants; to the teachers of Garrett county they are too often masters. It is a lamentable fact that pupils, and sometimes teachers, are so tied to books during recitations that only a very low degree of success is attained in many schools. We teachers must realize we are traveling a beaten road; then we should face about to direct the propelling powers of the vehicle and thus lift the wheels from the ruts which have so long retarded our progress. Though the path be old it may become one of great delight, if we pull out of the beaten track, for then we shall find new flowers, and even the old ones will present new beauties and bring us joys.

May I briefly present two pictures? The one shall be of a school in a rut, the other of a school which has pulled out of the beaten tracks.

If the teacher spends her evenings reading poor, though fascinating literature, or entertain some friend, or attend a neighborhood party, then retires at a late hour, she will get up late, get to school late, call up her classes late, then follows a pathetic scene a dull teacher, with a dull look, before a dull class, all of which conspires to make a dull recitation. Should she fall upon a proper question to some pupil, who is a servant to the text book, he will turn to the book, and answer satisfactorily, of course, though only to be forgotten the next minute. If a less tactful student is called upon, he will likely be prompted by his kind neighbor. Such conditions are lamentable indeed, and mark the point at which school life is a positive evil.

In the second picture we see a teacher who loves her work and is not satisfied until she has the consciousness that the pupils are making hearty, solid progress in the formation of habit and character. She rapidly, though intelligently, reviews her next day's lessons each evening. The next morning she has great physical strength and mental vigor. These, with her moral courage, are at once, though in an unconscious way, transmitted to he school. The classes are called promptly, and the scene is at once joyous! The teacher has nothing in her hand except perhaps, a pencil, surely not a book. The pupils just as free handed, each telling what he can in his own way, showing that he has used the book at the proper time for using books—before recitation. Thus the teacher guides the pupil in developing mental strength and skill rather than looking superficially for facts. Such conditions are scenes over which angels might rejoice!

Now fellow teachers, the first picture presents a teacher who does not care for her school; the second one, a teacher who loves her work. The first is drifting down stream; the second is propelling the boat against the tide.

It will require some effort to break away from using books during recitations, but you try it. Of course there are exceptions, but your rule should be to stand before your class without a book. Look at your pupils and have them look at you; soon there will be a system of wireless telegraphy—an exchange of thought and spirit—and the busy life becomes the panacea of many schoolroom ills.

THE above picture of the man and fish is the trade-mark of Scott's Emulsion, and is the synonym for strength and purity. It is sold in almost all the civilized countries of the globe.

If the cod fish became extinct it would be a world-wide calamity, because the oil that comes from its liver surpasses all other fats in nourishing and life-giving properties. Thirty years ago the proprietors of Scott's Emulsion found a way of preparing cod liver oil so that everyone can take it and get the full value of the oil without the objectionable taste. Scott's Emulsion is the best thing in the world for weak, backward children, thin, delicate people, and all conditions of wasting and lost strength.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much safer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

It is not the site of a town, but its character that makes it a desirable place to live. A live, prosperous town is a desirable one to live in, and a town may prosper and yet be small. Every citizen in a town should be interested in its prosperity. One of the best ways to help a town is to speak well of it. It is true patriotism to stand by your town, and interests that effect the town should effect every citizen.

Never forget you are a part of the town, and that your own deportment helps to make up the strangers' estimate of the place. Sell all you can and buy all you can at home. Every dollar that is sent or carried away from home makes the town that much poorer. If you have the means invest in something that will give somebody employment. Do not kick at a proposed improvement simply because it is not at your door.

A newspaper is in no sense a child of charity. It earns twice over every dollar it receives, and it is second to no enterprise in contributing to the upbuilding of a community. Its patrons reap far more benefits from its pages than its publishers, and in calling for the support of the community in which it is published, it asks for no more than in all fairness belongs to it, though generally it receives less. Patronize and help your paper as you would any other enterprise because it helps you, and not as an act of charity.

A perfect town is that in which you see the farmer patronizing the home merchants, the laborers spending the money they earn with their own tradesmen, and all animated by a spirit that will not purchase articles abroad if they can be bought at home. The spirit of reciprocity between man and the mechanic, tradesman and laborer, farmer and manufacturer, results every time in making the town a perfect one to do business in. "Perfection" should always be desired, even where attainment is barely possible, we presume, but a perfect town must be denominated a great rarity until we reach a more advanced stage toward the millenium than has yet been gained.

THE DEATH RECORD.

JACOB R. SHAFFER.

On January 15th, 1907, at his late home in Bosworth, Carroll county, Missouri, Jacob R. Shaffer. The deceased was married many years ago to the sister of Mrs. Rowan White and Mrs. John W. Arnold, both of Oakland, and is remembered by many of Oakland's old residents.

MISS TINA GARLITZ.

The sad news of the death of Miss Tina Garlitz, of Avilton, both shocked and saddened her many friends in this vicinity last Monday evening about 6 o'clock. The death angel hovered over the bed all day, while her friends waited and hoped, but at last she gave up the ghost and the angel with her soul in keeping took its flight into a fairer clime than this. She seemed to know by a heavenly instinct that the flame of life was flickering and ere long would pass into eternity. She was the faithful telephone operator at Avilton for several years. All unite in declaring her one of the most efficient in the county. She was a sweet girl, and loved by all who knew her. Her age was 14 years. She was kind, sympathetic and the picture of health. It seemed impossible for one so young to die so suddenly. Dr. Robinson, of Grantsville, who was the attending physician, announces that the sudden end was due to appendicitis. She was taken away just in the bloom of life, yet she relinquished it without a murmur. The deceased is mourned by a mother, brothers, sisters and countless friends. There will now be two vacant chairs around the family altar, her father having died about a year ago. By faith she was a Catholic having been confirmed about a month ago, we have a sincere hope of meeting her beyond in a land where there shall be no death.

"Only a step between life and death—
Length of a heart beat, span of a breath!
Think of it, soul—but an instant's flight
From here and now to the judgment light!"

A SCHOOL COMPANION.

New Germany, Md., Jan. 27.

WILLIAM W. THRASHER

Died, at his home in Deer Park, on January 22nd, at 12.20 o'clock p. m., William W. Thrasher, aged 48 years, after an illness of less than two weeks. The deceased leaves a wife and nine children to mourn the loss of a loving husband, a kind father, and a true and generous friend. His widow was a daughter of the late John Jankey and a sister of Mrs. Louisa Chambers, of Oakland.

Funeral services was conducted at the home of the deceased on Thursday, the 24th inst., at 11 o'clock by his pastor, Rev. E. Manges, after which the Red Men's organization, of which our friend and brother was a member, took charge, composed of about thirty members mostly from Loch Lynn, Oakland and a few from this place. Their service at the grave was solemn and impressive.

It was the pleasure of the writer to know our dead friend from his early manhood and I know I voice the sentiment of all our citizens when I say this kind and generous friend had not an enemy in the large circle of his acquaintances, both home and abroad.

At his trade, that of painter and upholsterer, he was always selected by the B. and O. Hotel managers to do the artistic work at the hotel and cottages, and as a landscape amateur artist he had a talent of merit, as the many paintings that adorn his late home attest.

Whilst his loving wife and devoted sons and daughters miss his sunny smiles and devotion, his many friends of this place miss his cordial greetings and think of his many, many acts of kindness and his genial hospitality in his home.

Our good kind friend, whilst he had, as we all have, his human weakness at times, he had his noble and generous qualities that overbalanced all his little faults ten thousand times.

With tears we say, farewell.

A FRIEND.

GARRETT V. MOON.

Garrett V. Moon departed this life at his late residence in Ryan's Glade, Thursday, January 24, 1907, aged 84 years, 4 months and 15 days. Ever overflowing with genuine brotherly kindness, those who knew him found in him a treasure rare. His home life was simple and beautiful. Dark clouds of affliction had passed over that home, but they were not permitted to linger long in the atmosphere of a sunny soul. The many who were privileged to share the open-handed hospitality of that home will ever cherish pleasant memories of Uncle Garrett. He was a Christian, and as he grew in years his christian life grew more and more beautiful. He loved the bible; he meditated therein day and night, and we have the blessed assurance that he has entered into rest. He was married twice. His first wife was a Miss Enlow and to this union were born a son and daughter: Jerry who now resides at Waynesboro, Pa., and Rachael who married Mr. J. O. Harvey, and preceded her father to the glory land many years, following after her mother. His second wife was Miss Jane Wilson, (a noble christian woman, too), who was called to her reward about eleven years ago. Five sons and six daughters from this marriage are left to mourn the loss of a kind and loving father. They are George W., J. Whit., Charles L., O. Scott, Santford A., Mrs. Columbus Paugh, Mrs. N. B. Harvey, Mrs. E. C. Hardesty, Mrs. J. W. Wagoner, Miss Ruth and Miss Victoria.

Adieu, sweet friends, I have waited long
To hear the message that calls me home,
And now it comes like a low sweet song
Of welcome over the river's foam,
And my heart shall ache, and my feet roam
No more, no more, I am going home.

Do not weep for me, friends, but lay
Peacefully over my silent breast
The hands whose labor is done, and say
"He hath entered in at the gates of rest,"
And God is merciful—God knows best,
And sweet to the weary is rest, sweet rest.

Why should I linger? I long to go;
And though "no price in my hand I bring,"
The Christ who died for us loves us so,
And simply still to His cross I cling,
Never more from that cross to roam,
I'm going home, I'm going home.

Home! where no storm and no tempest raves,
In the light of the calm eternal day;
Where no willows droop over lonely graves,
And tears from my eyes shall be wiped away,
And my heart shall ache, and my feet roam
No more, no more, I'm going home.

MRS. HANNAH S. LILLER.

Mrs. Hannah S., widow of the late William Liller, of Oakland, died at the residence of her son, Mr. Charles Liller, on Second street, last Saturday afternoon at four o'clock. For more than twenty years Mrs. Liller had been a confirmed invalid, rheumatism having rendered her perfectly helpless. Her death is attributed to the inroads made upon her system by this insidious disease. From her young childhood she was a member of the M. E. church and was strengthened in her faith, even though terribly afflicted. She was born at Aurora, West Va., more than fifty-six years ago, being a daughter of the late John S. McCrum of that village. She was married thirty-five years ago, her husband having preceded her to the grave on December 27th, 1903. She was the mother of four sons and one daughter, the daughter having died in infancy and one son was killed on the railroad in Oakland while yet a youth. Her surviving sons are Messrs. Clyde and Charles of Oakland, and William, of Lonaconing. Her funeral was conducted from her late home on Monday afternoon at two o'clock by Rev. J. B. Workman, pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church, with interment in the Oakland cemetery. Mrs. Liller's life and her abiding faith in the rulings of Providence throughout the years of her affliction were beautiful object lessons to those who were her companions and acquaintances.

Argument for New Trial.

Tomorrow morning at half past eight o'clock Associate Judge Henderson will hear argument of the motion made some weeks ago by the attorneys for Charles Platt, who was convicted of having burned the McMillan saw mill, for a retrial of the case. Platt is still confined in the jail here and will remain in the custody of the sheriff until the motion is disposed of by the Court. If the Court denies him a new trial he will then receive his sentence.

Mr. and Mrs. Flowers of Belington, who were in the city yesterday attending the funeral of Mrs. Flowers' brother, Mr. P. E. Kimmell, returned to their home last evening. They were accompanied home by Mr. William Kimmell of Thayerville, Md., who goes to visit the father, Mr. Christian Kimmell, now lying quite ill at Mrs. Flowers' home. Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Kimmell of Fairmont, remained in the city over night and will go this evening to Belington, where they will spend Sunday at the bedside of the sufferer. —Grafton Sentinel.

WANTED—Information as to address of Thomas H. Frost or widow or heirs if dead. He was born in Allegany county, Md., about 1839, and served in Co. A, First W. Va. Cav., in the Civil War. About 1873 he lived in Colorado. Small recovery can probably be made. Address Harvey Spalding & Sons, Washington, D. C.

Ice Harvest On.

With the very mild weather up until a few days ago the indications were that little if any ice was to be harvested in this section the present winter, but the change in temperatare the latter part of last week and the continued cold this week, has formed from six to eight inches of good clear ice and yesterday morning men and teams begun the task of cutting, hauling and storing the congealed masses in the many ice houses about town. At Mountain Lake Park Mr. Jacob Echard, who has the contract for cutting the ice and filling the Association's ice house, has a number of men at work and expects to store several thousand tons besides shipping a number of car loads to eastern points.

Keyser Board of Trade Has Extensive Powers.

The Keyser Board of Trade has been organized under a new charter in which the body is capitalized at $50,000. J. T. Sincell was elected president; C. W. Siever, vice president; O. A. Hood, secretary, and H. L. Arnold, treasurer. The board of directors is made up of Geo. T. Carskadon, F. H. Babb, O. A. Hood, S. N. Moore, P. M. Spangler, J. T. Sincell, H. L. Arnold, D. T. Greenwade, J. C. Watson, C. W. Siever and H. S. Thompson. Plans are being formulated for an aggressive effort toward getting new industries to Keyser, and the Board of Trade will have power to engage in any manufacturing or other business.

SMITH'S FORECAST FOR FEBRUARY

West Virginia's Prophet Registers Another Guess.

A number of disturbing factors will center on the early part of the month, each lending additional force to the exciting cause which not only will be felt at their central periods but also through the month. February is likely to be the monarch of the winter. The changes in temperature will be very sudden and extreme, much windy weather and in many localities of a violent character, especially on the gulf and the Atlantic coasts. In the south rain and electric showers and in some localities cyclonic disturbance. In central parts rain, sleet, snow and possibly thunder showers. In northern sections rain, sleet, and snow, then blizzards and blockades followed by intense cold. The first period of disturbance will center on the 3d or 4th, attended by rain, sleet and snow, followed on the 5th by a very cold wave. Touching the 7th or 8th the cold will relax. The second period of disturbance will start by an increase of heat in the temperature on or about the 7th or 8th and center on the 9th, which will run to the 12th or 13th, then will be followed by an extreme cold wave to about the 15th or 16th. The temperature will change to summer warmth and possibly thunder storms about the 18th or dates touching it, which will change very quick into sleet and snow and a cold snap. A return of storm conditions on or touching the 21st or 22d and holding to the 23d or 24th. At most or at all the changes through the month, rain or snow will materialize. The last disturbed period will center on the 27th and passing over into March.

Convicted of River Pollution.

A jury at Marlington, Pocahontas county, W. Va., brought in a verdict against the United States Leather Company, charged with the pollution of the Greenbrier river, the indictment having been found under the common law. Prof. D. H. Hite, the chemist of the West Virginia Experimental station, stated that dangerous bacteria were found in the water in alarming quantities. The fine has not yet been imposed by Judge Bennett.

Stockholders' Meeting.

The annual meeting of the stockholders of The Sover Run Coal Co. will be held at 2 o'clock P. M. at the Company's office, Sover, Md.

Tuesday, Feb. 12th, 1907,

W. R. TYLER, Sec'y.

The Age of Fraternalism

By Rev. Dr. LYMAN ABBOTT

IN religion we have passed out of the notion of individualism as well as that of autocracy, and we have come to believe religion not a matter between man and his God, but A SOCIAL MATTER. Four of the Ten Commandments relate to our relations with God and six to those with our fellow men.

God rained down untold wealth on us here in America. We have followed the "here-it-is-get-who-can" INDIVIDUALISTIC policy. We have held that commerce is war, and all is fair in war, and we are getting away from that. Right here are propositions, I think, that indicate it:

President Roosevelt favors an inheritance tax; that is, a plan whereby at the gates of death a man shall give back to the community SOME OF THAT he has taken from it. Mr. Bryan favors an income tax, the giving back to the community a SUBSTANTIAL PART of a fortune, and there is the proposition to administer by the nation direct the great highways of the nation.

THESE PROPOSITIONS RUN DIRECTLY COUNTER TO INDIVIDUALISM.

Even the corporation is a democratic, FRATERNALIZING institution. Not that it has always worked out that way, for oftentimes it has not.

Then there is the trades union, which may be a great force for fraternalism. We have a concrete example in the big coal strike. We don't think of that as a fraternal operation. In this strike was the miners' union, made up of men of nineteen nationalities, many languages and dialects and several religious faiths. They go together, 100,000 men in common interest. Their experience was an earnest of what may come when men get together IN THE TRUE FRATERNAL SPIRIT.

Now, there is a general idea abroad that wealth is concentrated in this country as nowhere else. Nowhere, on the contrary, I believe, is wealth SO WELL DISTRIBUTED, else it be in Australia. Statistics of Charles B. Spahr show that only about 1½ per cent of Englishmen have more than $5,000 each, while fully one-eighth of the Americans have that amount.

While we have not as yet come anywhere near the point of EQUABILITY IN DISTRIBUTION, with diffusion of power and education will come diffusion of wealth. We are coming to fraternalism in government also. Despite what some would have us believe there is no more of the "man on horseback." We are coming around to look at the government as a great organism FOR INTERNAL BETTERMENT. We hear talk of the government entering into the express business, into the railway or telegraph business and perhaps of entering the grocery business.

ABOUT THE PRACTICABILITY OF ALL THAT I DON'T KNOW. BUT I DO KNOW THAT PEOPLE ARE COMING TO THE IDEA THAT IF THEY FIND THEY CAN DO CERTAIN THINGS CHEAPER AND BETTER AND AT LESS COST FOR THEMSELVES THAN PRIVATE ENTERPRISES CAN DO THEM, THEN THEY OUGHT TO DO THE THINGS THEMSELVES.

Woman Not Yet Fitted For Right of Suffrage

By MARIE CORELLI, Novelist

IF woman has the NATURAL HERITAGE of her sex, the mystic power to persuade, enthrall and SUBJUGATE man, she has no need to come down from her throne to mingle in any of his political frays.

In the fashion papers man sees woman as the FOOL RAMPANT. She is depicted as semibald, holding her wig in one hand, ready to put it on. She is shown in a half nude state, thin and scraggy, but again unblushingly holds artificially molded plump portions of her body, which nature failed to supply, in readiness to fasten over the hollow places. She is exhibited plainly and pitilessly AS A SWINDLE.

Do women imagine that men never look at such papers—never perceive the bold, prominent challenge of these degraded advertisements, which instruct them as to what a painted, powdered, padded, dyed, frizzled, SHAMELESS CREATURE a woman may be and often is?

A CASUAL STUDY OF OUR MODERN LADIES' PICTORIALS WILL CONVINCE THE MOST OPTIMISTIC MALE SUPPORTER OF WOMAN'S RIGHTS THAT A MAJORITY OF THE FAIR SEX IS NOT AS YET IN ANY WAY FITTED FOR THE FRANCHISE.

Mastery of the Air Is Near

By Captain FERBER, In Charge of Aerostatics In the French Army

HUMAN mastery over the air is VIRTUALLY ACHIEVED. None of the startling achievements of the past, neither steam, electricity nor the telephone, can compare with what the future now holds in store for us. Not only will the life of individuals be revolutionized, but governments will be compelled to devise in almost every department new methods to meet the changed conditions. This change will come with AMAZING SUDDENNESS, and France is taking the precaution to meet it.

In the customs service present methods of watching the frontiers will be obsolete. AERIAL PATROLS will be necessary to prevent the smuggling of contraband across the border. The police of all cities will have to be provided with flying machines to protect the people from the NEW OPPORTUNITIES OF CRIME which aerial locomotion will place in the power of criminals. It would seem that flying machines would enable anarchists to achieve any end by threats against not only rulers, but whole cities; but, with the police sailing about in the air, it will be no more difficult to frustrate their plots than it is NOW on solid ground.

In war the intelligence service will be entirely consigned to the aerostatic divisions, and armed airships will guard the bivouacs of armies.

Nan's Wooing

By TAYLOR WHITE

Copyright, 1905, by P. C. Eastment

"I simply must make that train," said Nan. "I must get home."

Bert looked at his mother. She made a helpless gesture.

"I don't see how it can be done, my dear Nan," she said weakly. "Both of the horses have gone home, the livery has no horse in, and the expressman cannot come for your trunk until this afternoon."

"Can't we beg, borrow or buy a rig?" she demanded briskly. "Surely every horse and cart in Pleasantville is not engaged."

"I guess you'll have to stay over until tomorrow," said Bert blandly. "I can get a horse by then."

"I'm going to get one right away," she said decidedly. "I promised Nell Taylor when we were at school that I would be her bridesmaid and I'm going to."

Mrs. Montrose stared. "My dear Nan," she said coldly, "I hope you will do nothing to excite comment."

Nan stared. She had told them a week ago that she must leave on Thursday, and they had made no move toward looking after her departure. Now that she had been forced to take the matter into her own hands this placid remark irritated her.

"I am going to get that trunk to the train if I have to hire a circus parade," she said spiritedly as she darted out of the door.

Mrs. Montrose held up her hands in placid horror. "My dear Bert," she said, "it is almost fortunate that the girl will not have you."

"Nothing of the sort," was the brutal response. "I need the money, and you know I do. If you hadn't made that row about her riding Dwight's horse it would have been all right. I was hoping if I forgot about the baggage she might stay on, and I could patch it up."

"Well, let us hope that the girl does not entirely disgrace us," was the wailing rejoinder as Mrs. Montrose went into the parlor, where she could command a view of the street.

Nan Udell had been a thorn in her flesh ever since she had come from the west for a visit. Her father and the late John Montrose had been mining partners in the early days. Each had made his strike, and when Nan and Bert were born it was agreed that they were to marry when they should be old enough. Nan had come visiting with the implied understanding that they were to wed, but Bert had soon disgusted her, while there had been numerous conflicts between herself and Mrs. Montrose, who was perpetually shocked at her breezy western manner.

"I FANCY YOU SHOCKED MRS. MONTROSE, SHE IS SO EMINENTLY PROPER."

She administered the last shock when she presently drove up to the house on the seat of an express wagon, talking spiritedly to the driver. She sprang to the ground before he could descend and assist her and ran up the steps.

"All right!" she cried as she threw open the door. "Please let John help the man with the trunks."

"But how are you going to get into town?" objected Mrs. Montrose.

"I'll ride with the man," laughed Nan. "He said I might. It won't be the first time. Goodby, Mrs. Montrose. I'm sorry I was such a trouble to you. I'll wire when I get home and write and tell you all about the wedding. Goodby, Bert."

She turned and flew down the steps after the man and with a spring was back on the seat beside him.

"If you're in a hurry," she said contentedly as he touched the team with the whip, "the only way is to do a thing yourself."

"You seem quite capable of looking after things yourself," he laughed. "I fancy you shocked Mrs. Montrose. She is so eminently proper."

"I'm sorry," she said penitently, 'but I just had to get home, and they knew it. I'm glad I found you."

"So am I," he laughed.

"You ought to be out west," she said, with a comprehensive gaze that was not impertinent because it was so frank. "You're more the type of western man. They don't have a lot of men of your type here."

The driver flushed. "We have them," he said quietly, "but I guess they don't travel in the Pleasantville set." He laughed as he thought of the snobbish social circle of the little suburb where even the trolley was barred. Nan read his thoughts and laughed in sympathy. Her visit had not been pleasant.

She chatted on as they sped along. The man was singularly intelligent for a workman, and she enjoyed his chat as much as she did the presence of a real man after six weeks with the pale youths who constituted the male element of Pleasantville society. She was almost sorry when they reached the town and drove up to the station.

The driver ushered her into the waiting room, purchased her ticket and sleeper, checked her trunks and finally came toward her. "Here is what I had to pay out," he said, offering a neat memorandum. "This is the change."

She glanced at the coins and smiled. "That's the last of my greenbacks," she laughed. "Now I'll get gold again. I like it lots better."

"We don't take to it on here," he smiled.

"But I've got to give you one," she said. "I have no more bills."

She held out a five dollar gold piece, and after a pause his hand closed over it. "Thank you," he said. "But you would have been welcome to my services. I hope you have a pleasant trip."

"That's a real goodby," she said impulsively, remembering the frigid farewell at the house. "Will you shake hands?"

His hand closed over hers with a pressure that almost crushed it; then, with a bow, he turned and left the room, while she settled herself for the hour wait.

Nan was in time to be a bridesmaid, and when she had written a long account to Mrs. Montrose she sought to put thoughts of Pleasantville out of her mind. It was easy enough to forget Mrs. Montrose and the colorless Bert, but somehow the expressman would crop up in her memory.

She assured herself over and over again that she did not care for any man who was content to drive an express wagon, and yet all the time she knew that she did care, and when a few weeks later she entered the Cromwells' ballroom and at the far end saw a face she thought familiar her heart gave a bound.

It could not be the expressman, she assured herself. The Cromwells were most exclusive, and yet——. He came toward her with his hostess on his arm.

"Mr. Newhall has been asking about you, my dear," smiled the old lady. "It seems that you met back east."

"I do not flatter myself that Miss Udell recalls me," he smiled. "But I had the good fortune to be of some slight service at her departure."

"Well, you can recall it to her," said Mrs. Cromwell placidly. "I must go and look after that Templeton girl. Look after Paul, my dear."

"I suppose you are surprised to see me here," she smiled. "May I explain? The conservatory is very handy."

Nan bowed, and he led the way. "You see," he began when they had found a palm screened nook, "my father has some old fashioned ideas about work. He says that a man who commands must first be able to obey, and he put me on with the men on precisely the same footing. He even docked me half a day's pay for going to town without permission and chuckled when I told him I was still $2 to the good."

"Then you are not a regular expressman?"

"That was the mill wagon. It had express painted on it when we bought it, and we did not take the trouble to paint it out."

"What did you think of me?" she gasped.

"I thought that a girl with your capacity was worth knowing," he said promptly. "So I made a note of your name and address, which were on your trunks, remembered that Mrs. Cromwell was a school chum of my mother's and came out to see her."

"I suppose she feels highly complimented," suggested Nan.

"Oh, I told her why I came," he said calmly. "She quite indorses my opinion and my quest."

"When do you return?" asked Nan, to change the topic.

"As soon as you have promised to marry me," he said promptly. "It's a brief wooing, Nan, but I can't wait. Will you give me encouragement, dear?"

"Yes," said Nan, "I—I—do like you."

He slipped a ring on her finger.

"I am going to have that five dollar piece made into the wedding ring," he said. "That was why I took it that day."

"You loved me then?" she asked, surprised.

"Yes," he declared.

"That's funny," said Nan musingly. "I guess I did too."

Mark Twain's Criticism.

"I once had the honor of reading a tale of mine to Mark Twain," said an author, "and, thanks to his criticism, the tale was greatly improved. Originally it was too high flown. He brought it down to earth and made it homelier and truer.

"For instance, the tale concluded with these words:

"'Mabel's lovely eyes drooped for answer, a faint flush tinted her cheek, and she gave him both her hands, and there, in the old orchard, in the shade of the heavy fruited trees, he drew her to his breast and, raising her long ringlets to his lips, kissed them reverently.'

"Mr. Clemens at this ending blew a cloud of smoke thoughtfully into the air, and as he watched the smoke dissolve he drawled:

"'What do you think now, honestly, of a young man who would go nibbling at a girl's back hair when she had her face with her?'"—Indianapolis Star.

Osana San's Adventure

By Constance D'Arcy MacKay

Copyright, 1906, by [illegible]

It was a bright spring morn. Sunlight poured down over the quaint glistening roofs of the little town of Yacco. Mists rose and melted from the encircling rice fields. The perfume of cherry blossoms was upon the wind—an erratic wind that blew in breath snatching puffs and twirled the little fans in the black polished coiffure of Osana San as she toddled daintily along the street in her lacquered sandals. Her blue and gold kimono caught the sunlight with a gleam. Her huge red sash, tied in a butterfly bow, added a daring note of color, and her gayly flowered paper parasol made just the background for her delicate oval face. Her skin was the cream of ivory faintly tinted with rose. Her mouth was like a scarlet lily, and her slanting eyes were like dark jewels—very somber, but with a brilliant glint in their depths.

"She looked as if she had stepped straight out of the 'Mikado' or off a Satsuma vase," declared Mrs. Carrington, the wife of the American consul, glancing up from the luncheon table to watch the passing of Osana San. "She is the very essence of this beautiful Japan."

"She's delicious," agreed Mr. Carrington. "And the American words and phrases you have taught her make her doubly so. She gives a twist to them that is all her own. I tell you, Alice, she could teach our American women a good many things—she's so demure and quiet and contented."

Yet, had Mr. Carrington but known it, contented was precisely what Osana San was not. A perfect crater of unrest burned in her little soul. Her blood raced in time to the pulse of spring, and as she walked through the sleepy, half deserted streets of Yacco there was nothing in the world for which she longed so much as for an adventure, and she had her wish. As she passed the door of a teacup shop the wind gave a sudden gust, blowing her paper parasol inside out and wrenching it from her hand. A whirl of dust filled her eyes, and she shut them with a quick blink. When she opened them, she saw a tall man in blue serge standing in front of her. He was holding her parasol.

"OAI! OAI!" SHE CRIED IN JAPANESE. "STOP ME! STOP ME!"

"I think this is yours," he said, smiling pleasantly.

"A thousand thank yous," murmured Osana San in her very best English. "I fear my humble parasol has given your illustrious self a great trouble."

"A great pleasure, believe me," he answered. Then, with a long look at Osana San, he raised his hat and went back into the teacup shop.

"Oh!" breathed Osana San, rubbing her smooth fingers up and down the bamboo handle where his hands had touched it. How tall and handsome he was and how broad shouldered! She had seen few American men save Mr. Carrington, for Yacco, though not far from Tokyo, was off the main line and so inaccessible that travelers seldom came there. Mr. Carrington, moreover, was old, with a wrinkled face and white hair, while this stranger was young—divinely young, with a way of looking. The rose deepened in her cheek as she remembered it. It was a day of marvels. And there were more to come, for, standing near by, so near that it was a wonder she had not noticed it, was a strange object such as Osana San had never seen before. She guessed it to be one of the horseless carriages of which Mrs. Carrington had told her. She gazed at it, fascinated. And then a wild idea took possession of her. She wondered how it would seem to sit on the cushioned leather seat! She gave a hurried glance up and down the street. There was no one in sight. In the teacup shop the young American was busily selecting china. His back was turned toward her. He would never know. Swiftly she made up her mind and stepped into the motor.

"Now I am like an American girl," she said to herself, intoxicated with the newness of the thing. She heard a heavy step in the shop behind her and started up guiltily. Her moment of stolen sweetness was over. But alas for Osana San! In her haste the wide sleeve of her kimono caught on the lever of the machine. She jerked it, and the mischief was done. Quietly the machine began rolling along the street. For awhile she was too dazed to scream, and when she found voice she was already on the outskirts of Yacco. The road stretched on miles ahead, as straight and white as a long ribbon. A laborer toiling in the rice fields raised his head to look at her.

"Oai! Oai!" she cried in Japanese. "Stop me! Stop me!" The man stared at her stupidly, too amazed to move, and she sped past him. Her hands fluttered about the nickel plated wonders of the motor like a pair of frightened birds. Perhaps if she pressed something it would stop! Very cautiously she tried. The result was a loud "Honk, honk!" ear piercing and terrible. Osana San crouched on the seat with a sob of utter despair and helplessness. On and on she went, past rice fields and low lying marshes where cranes flew, calling dismally to one another; past little thatched farmhouses sheltered from the midday glare by clumps of graceful bamboo. Osana San was becoming desperate. Something must be done. Gathering her courage together, she pushed and pulled at all the contrivances she could lay hands on, and luck favored her. In front of a lonely wayside temple the motor came to a sudden stop. With a great breath of relief, Osana San alighted. Tears were still glistening on her cheeks. "Here in the shadow of the temple I will be safe," she said, "and I will wait till the august and honorable stranger comes for his most terrifying machine."

But when the stranger, whose name was Douglass Morton, arrived in a jinrikisha some hours later he found Osana San cuddled up on the temple steps, fast asleep.

"Poor little frightened butterfly!" he murmured. "Thank heaven she's safe! It's a pity to waken her."

Osana San opened her eyes and saw him bending over her.

"Most august," she faltered, "my name is Osana San, and my unworthy curiosity"—

"That's all right," Morton said heartily. "I understood how it happened and all you're going to tell me, except how in thunder you had wit enough to stop the machine. Since you're safe, nothing else matters, and I bless all the gods of Japan that this road is as straight as a string. Otherwise—well, we won't think of that. Besides, there is much else to talk of. Do you believe in love at first sight, Osana San?"

Osana San shook her glossy head.

"My poor intelligence does not comprehend your illustrious words," she answered.

Morton laughed.

"I haven't time to pick it out of the phrase book now," he said, "but I'll explain it later if it takes me all the rest of my life to do it, or perhaps Mr. Carrington, the American consul, will explain it for me. He knows my family, and he ought to do me a good turn. You won't be afraid to ride back with me, will you, Osana San? The auto can't run away with you now, you know."

So back they went to Yacco, while the shadows of night deepened among the bamboo, and the moon rose, looking as large and red as a paper lantern. And a week later, in the Carringtons' pretty drawing room, Douglass Morton urged his impetuous suit. When Osana San finally understood his meaning she grew as pink as a cherry blossom.

"I be most afraid to live in your honorable and illustrious country, where everything go so fast—the motor carriages and the lovemaking."

"Osana San, do you mean that you will not marry me?" demanded Douglass Morton.

A dimple glimmered in the rose and ivory of Osana's cheek.

"Most august," she answered, "how could I be so rude?"

"It is 'Yes' then?" cried Morton joyfully.

"It is 'Yes,'" whispered little Osana San.

Genuine Eloquence.

Appeals from the organized charities are coming in from all directions. And there are sources of appeal which are not organized, yet quite worthy. One of the raggedest, dirtiest, most dejected of mendicants, sitting on the curbstone, appealed to me by his appearance. I had passed him in disgust, then conscience drove me back to him to see if he really suffered. "If in want, why don't you beg?" I demanded in anger. "Why don't you say something?" "Sure it's begging I am," he replied. "But you don't utter a word, man!" "I don't? Look at this"—picking up his nasty remnant of a coat—"and can't you see the skin speaking through my trousers? And ain't the bones cryin' out through my skin? Look at my sunken cheeks! See the famine that's starin' in my eyes! Man alive, ain't it beggin' I'm doin' with a hundred tongues?"—New York Press.

Our Billions of Ancestors.

Has anybody ever stopped to think how many male and female ancestors it took to bring us into the world? First, of course, it was necessary to have a father and mother, and our father and mother must have had a father and mother, and so on back to the time of Christ. A careful calculation of all these ancestors shows that there must have been 139,235,017,489,534,976 births to bring one of us into the world. And this is only from the time of Christ and not from the beginning of the world. According to one authority, if from a single couple for 5,000 years each husband and wife had married at the age of twenty-one and there had been no deaths the population of the earth would be 2,199,915, followed by 144 ciphers. To hold such a population it would take several worlds the size of ours.

A NATIONAL HIGHWAY FROM COAST TO COAST.

How the Cumberland Road and the Santa Fe Trail Are to Be Restored.

That the time is fast approaching when the necessity for good roads in America will be a national issue is apparent from the discussion of the subject, which is growing louder each day in all parts of the United States, says the Kansas City Star. Cities are looking carefully to their street paving, counties and states are talking more about their roads, and now the subject of a national highway has reached congress.

The creation of the American Appian way, beginning at Washington on Atlantic tidewater, following the trail of the historic national pike through the passes of the Appalachians and across the Ohio through the great middle west to St. Louis, and then in two great boulevards on to the Pacific, one of which will cross Montana to Puget sound and the other over the Santa Fe trail to San Francisco, will be the magnificent fruition of plans the first tentative steps of which have been taken in the introduction of a bill in congress by Representative George Pearre of Maryland for an appropriation for the restoration of the monuments and landmarks and the reconstruction of the ancient Cumberland road that by its building made an empire possible.

Pledged to the support of this bill are the rapidly growing automobile associations of the United States, and the strong good roads organizations, fast increasing in membership, are giving hearty cooperation to the project.

Save to the historian and those who live along the dusty thread of macadam that binds together Washington and St. Louis, the story of the old national pike is an unknown chapter to the present generation, yet the flavor of romance, the memory of almost forgotten glories, of a noble, ambitious mission successfully accomplished, clings to every hoary monument of that ancient highway.

And the word "ancient" is used advisedly, for the route is prehistoric. Centuries before the daring ships of Raleigh or Smith touched the coast of the new world, long before the Indians had invaded America over the vanished land bridge at Bering strait, ages before the mound builders had left their yet undeciphered messages, countless herds of bison roamed the continent. In their migrations they were America's first road-makers, and they did their work so well that a map of their trails and "traces" would be a duplicate of the great highway and railway systems of the present day.

The national pike, or the Cumberland road, as it was popularly called, was first a buffalo track worn deep across the Appalachians by the pounding hoofs of millions of bison. When the Indians came they followed this same trail in their hunting excursions and war expeditions, retreating over it to the west before the ever advancing, relentless frontier of the white man. Over this path came the Anglo-Saxon hunter and trapper, followed timidly and falteringly by the homemaker, until at last the tide of emigration poured in a deluge through the mountain passes to the land of promise.

To supply the trade demands of this growing western population in the early days long trains of pack ponies picked their way to and fro over the old Cumberland trail from the Potomac to the headwaters of the Ohio, to be displaced as increasing commerce and traffic widened the track into a road by the great Conestoga freight wagons and speeding mail coaches of the early days of the century, in turn to vanish when the steam railroad accomplished the supposedly impossible feat of climbing the mountains.

Every mile of the old Cumberland road is historic ground, consecrated by the bleeding feet of heroic nation builders. Over it toiled the young surveyor, Washington, nursing dreams of empire in his prophetic vision. Later over this same route tramped the scarlet coated British grenadiers, led by the boastful Braddock, whose grave is still green beside the deep trail cut by the ponderous army wagons of his ill starred expedition. After the colonies had achieved their independence the Braddock road was the pathway over which the veterans of the Revolution plodded painfully to take up even a greater work in the settlement of Ohio, Kentucky and Indiana—Virginia's imperial gift to the infant republic.

Discontent, deep seated and bitter, followed the rapid settlement of the transappalachian country. Despised, ridiculed and neglected by the tidewater patricians in control of the federal government, the settlers of the western valleys turned in almost justifiable treason to the support of the conspiracy of Burr, involving the pathetic tragedy of Bleunerhassett. An independent republic or group of republics in the great central west seemed a certainty.

At this grave crisis in the affairs of the young republic farsighted statesmen united in a successful demand for a great road that would pierce the mountain barriers and bind together forever the states of the Atlantic seaboard and the vast empire of the Mississippi valley. In 1802 President Jefferson signed the bill for the survey of the national pike from Cumberland to the headwaters of the Ohio. The first contract was awarded in 1811, and in 1818, the year of its completion, a flood of traffic of unexpected proportions began to pour over the new highway. The nation's first great problem of secession had been met and solved. In 1825 began the extension of the national pike from Wheeling to St. Louis, through the seats of government of the states of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois.

The reconstruction of the old national road will resurrect in a measure the vanished glories of the famous stagecoach days when John Bunting, Jim Reynolds, Billy Armour, Dave Gordon, Jim Burr and a host of other forgotten heroes of the road handled the lines over mettlesome horses, with the satisfying consciousness that in popular estimation they divided honors with men whose names are now imperishably embalmed in history.

Scattered along the old road at frequent intervals were the taverns, the nerve centres of the highway. Many of them were famous hostelries in their day, but their glory has long departed. Only a few remain, quaint and moss covered monuments of the past. Here and there along the pike the old buildings lie in ruins and in many instances others have been converted into farmhouses. It is expected that with the reconstruction of the old road many of these ancient taverns will be rebuilt, restoring the most picturesque feature of the life of the old turnpike.

The first taverns along the route were built of logs and consisted of only two rooms and a great fireplace, before which the tired travelers slept in their blankets, curled up on the puncheon floors. Their evolution into more pretentious structures came with the increase of traffic, and in the palmy days of the great road they furnished accommodations to suit the most exacting.

The great fireplace was a distinctive feature of the old taverns. Some of them were capable of holding a wagon load of wood at a time, flooding the great room with light that made candles unnecessary. Around the blaze gathered the merry crowd of travelers, and it was a gala event for the inn when the central figure of the group would be Clay, Jackson, Harrison, Lincoln, Douglas, Cass or some other distinguish personage of the time whose words would be treasured for years. Dickens, Mrs. Trollope, Prince Maximillian of Wield, Rafinesque, and many other travelers from Europe were guests of the old taverns and have left entertaining accounts of their impreesions.

At the side of the old fireplace hung the "flip iron" and the huge poker, and sometimes the latter utensil was seven or eight feet long. Its use was jealously guarded as a prerogative of the tavern landlord. None but the innkeeper could touch the great fire, which was one of the main features of their hospitality. Eccentric old Boss Rush, says Mr. Hurlburt in the "Historic Highways of America," kept his poker at his famous tavern at Smithfield (Big Crossings) under lock and key.

But, while the automobile and the pleasure coach may restore the old taverns to pristine glories, yet the real life of the ancient highway has passed beyond recall. The caravans of great freight wagons and long processions of mail and stagecoaches were picturesque features of the old life that history will not repeat.

But the time that the life of the old highway throbbed in its greatest intensity was when a president or a president elect passed in triumphant procession along its dusty stretches. It was the gala day of the "pike boys." All the taverns and houses along the route were bedecked in the welcome, and cheering crowds from miles around thronged the stopping places and crossroads. The finest horses and the most gorgeous coach procurable were assigned to to the task, and the proud position of "charioteer to the president" was given to the pick of the jehus on the line, who ever afterward were marked and noted. Jackson, Van Buren, Monroe, Harrison, Polk and Tyler passed over portions of the old road in dignified presidential pageant, like the triumphal Roman emperors. Clay, the great champion of the road and of the policy of internal improvements, was a favorite in every hamlet.

The opponents of internal improvements were far from popular in this new country, as Van Buren discovered once when his coach broke down in a spot where the mud was deepest, the axle having been sawed almost in two by some waggish wig.

But the life on the old pike was not without its dangers. In the wild passes of the Appalachians lurked the prototype of the modern road agent, and daring bandits frequently relieved panic stricken passengers of their valuables in the good old Dick Turpin way. Fatal wrecks sometimes occurred in which coaches were hurled from high cliff, dashing their passengers to death on the rocks below.

Hastily sketched, such was the past of the old national pike, which carried hundreds of thousands of population and millions of wealth into the west and which more than any other one thing served to harmonize and strengthen if not to save, the Union.

Of its future Mr. Hurlburt, an enthusiastic prophet, says: "It will become again the foremost of American highways. Its historic associations will render the route of increasing interest to the thousands who in other days will travel over those portions of the road which long ago became hallowed ground. 'The shades of death' will again be filled with the echoing horn which heraled the arrival of the old time coaches, and the winding ridge will again be crowded with the traffic of a nation. A hundred Cumberland road taverns will be opened and bustling landlords welcome as of yore the travel stained visitor. Merry parties will again fill those tavern halls, now long silent, with their laughter."

Historic associations are not confined entirely to the eastern end of the proposed national highway. From Kansas City to the Pacific coast the old Santa Fe trail will be the most important and natural route, and where in the world is a thoroughfare with so stirring a history? There is much of historical significance to be preserved on this famous trail, and the need of a government road from coast to coast is ever present in the minds of military commanders. The automobilist will hail with joy Representative Pearre's great project, and he should have the co-operation of every farmer and every class of citizen.

IS YOUR COUCH NORTH BY SOUTH?

If So, You Sleep in the Direct Path of the Health-Giving Magnetic Currents.

It is a singular coincidence that as earthquake areas range from north to south, so there are continually passing in the same direction health-giving currents of electricity. Are you taking advantage of these magnetic currents? Many sufferers from "nerves" are now being cured by some form of electrical treatment. Already we have medical cabinets, rheumatic rings, electric belts, and Harrogate is famed for its Darsonval bath. This latter is one in which thousands of volts are passed through the body.

Fancy an electric spark measuring six inches, coming from one's elbow! This occurs when the bath attendant touches the patient. Yes, this treatment—perfectly harmless—is one of the most famous in Europe.

An explanation of these magnetic currents will interest.

The mariner's compass always points, as we say, north and south. But that north is not exactly the north pole to which Nansen aspired to reach. It is the magnetic pole, and is situated a little to the left of the real north pole.

If a needle was floating in water immediately above this pole, then we should find that the position of the needle was an upright one. Apparently a giganic magnet is buried deep down in the ground. A similar "dipping" of the needle would take place at the south magnetic pole: but the exact position of this latter has not yet been definitely fixed.

Now, between these magnetic areas regular electric currents run, They are not running in straight lines, because of the immense amount of mineral ore hidden in the earth.

As an example, it may be remembered by the reader that a terrible shipwreck took place some few years ago in the Bay of Biscay. The vessel ran on the rocks owing to the compass being deflected by the presence of magnetized ore in the neighborhood of the coast.

Maps are published showing the direction and strength of these currents. At Kew (soon to be, if not now vacated) and other observations, scientists are daily taking "magnetographs." These are photographs of a beam of light from a mirror attached to a magnet.

If the light acting on a strip of sensitive paper (wrapped round a revolving drum) comes out as a straight line then no change has taken place. If the line is "wavy," magnetic disturbances has taken place and by comparing different records a line is drawn on the map.

In the Isle of Wight the "seismograph" registers on a strip of paper in the direction and time of any earthquake shock—however slight it character. It was by this instrument that the earth storms in South America were found to have moved the land of Europe slightly.

When the earth is troubled magnetically, thunderstorms, sheet lightning and the fine spectacle of the aurora borealis or "northern lights" are among the visible effects.

When sleeping, it is advisable to have our bed facing the south. We are then in the direct line of any refreshing influence of nature. Perhaps the Indian recognized this fact unconsciously when he wrapped himself up in his skin rug on the prairie, with his head to the north star.—London Chronicle.

The Discontented Man.

He wooed and won a pretty girl
With hair of shining gold;
She loved him with a loyalty
Quite touching to behold.
But other people's wives he used
Approvingly to scan
And growl and grumble at his own—
The discontented man.

His business prospered every day,
Another store he leased,
He bought a house and motor car,
His bank account increased,
But still he wore a gloomy face.
"While Jones is in the van,
My trade is going back," exclaimed
The discontented man.

His children in and out of school
Were well behaved and bright;
They reached the head of every class
And studied day and night.
"It didn't take me half so long
To learn what I began;
I wasn't such a dunce," complained
The discontented man.

He went abroad and viewed unmoved
The Rhine's majestic flow,
The snowy splendor of the Alps,
The matchless lakes below.
"I want to get a steamer home
As quickly as I can.
There's nothing here worth seeing," cried
The discontented man.

At last he left his earthly cares
To mount the starry skies
And knock upon the pearly gates
That lead to paradise.
And, though to fling the portals wide
St. Peter nimbly ran,
"You're long enough about it," said
The discontented man.

Senator Dubois has a new cook. People keeping house in Washington always have new cooks. This particular Dubois cook came claiming that she could do anything, and Mrs. Dubois intimated on the first day that they would have some macaroni for dinner.

"What's that?" asked the cook.

Mrs. Dubois took her to the pantry and showed her the macaroni. "Do you mean to say you don't know what this is?" Mrs. Dubois asked.

"Oh, yes, 'deed I do, missus," the cook replied. "Only in the las' place I worked they lighted the gas with them things."—New York World.

"Well, my father's got more brains than yours has anyway."

"No, he hasn't either," said William junior, "for my father's not only got his own brains, but a lot of other men's brains in bottles on his mantelpiece."—Boston Herald.

Not So Very Final.

"I cannot be your wife," she replied and added, "This is final."

He paced swiftly to and fro several times, then halted abruptly in front of her.

"Pray, be candid with me," he said, not without the note of masculine impatience. "About how final?"

This was too much. She burst into tears.

"How do I know?" she sobbed.—Puck.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44-5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

MERCURY WAS 25 BELOW ZERO THIS MORNING!

Coldest Since Jan. 18, 1893, When It Was 26 Degrees Below.

When Oakland awoke this morning her residents with one accord sought the thermometer to learn whether or not the mercury had become chilled and refused to work, the air being so cold and penetrating that one was inclined to believe that the improbable had occurred.

It was with thankfulness, however, when the readings of the gauge showed twenty-five degrees below zero, which is the record breaker for cold since January 18th, 1893, when the thermometer registered 26 degrees below.

Indications point to another cold night tonight, but all are hopeful that the mercury will stay in sight.

SEWER FRANCHISE AGAIN SOUGHT FOR OAKLAND.

Application Made to the Town Council at The Meeting Monday Night.

The question of a franchise to sewer the town came again to the front at the regular monthly meeting of the Town Council held on last Monday night when Mr. A. D. Naylor, representing himself and others, appeard before Council and requested that a franchise be granted him to sewer the town generally. The franchise sought by Mr. Naylor is drawn along the lines of other franchises granted by the Council heretofore and has been favorably commented upon by Councilmen and residents. The Council took no definite action upon Mr. Naylor's request but will do so at a meeting to be held for that purpose this evening.

Messrs. J. M. Falkenstein and A. L. Sines requested the privilege of entering Oakland with a new telephone line now building from out toward Cranesville to Oakland. The request was not cansidered at the meeting as nothing tangible was presented by the gentlemen who were requested to present the matter in proper form and it would then be taken up and given the proper consideration.

The regular bills for the month of January were presented and ordered paid.

The following judges and clerks of election were appointed by Council to conduct the corporation election to be held on the second Monday in March next: Dr. E. H. Bartlett, Austin Brown and John W. Arnold, judges; Ernest Townshend and Eugene Baumgardner, clerks.

FARMERS' INSTITUTES IN GARRETT COUNTY.

Sessions Will Be Held at Grantsville, Accident and Oakland.

To the Editor of The Republican.

As is our custom, we herewith hand you a sketch of our work for the season, and also of our speakers.

Our staff this year is, as previously, a strong one, composed of men who have had the best school training, as well as being practical men, being themselves successful in the handling of the products of which they speak.

Mr. R. L. Watts, Scalp Level, Pa., is one of the best Institute workers on the staff of that State, is a successful market gardener and fruit grower. His farm of 145 acres has shown splendid results. He makes a specialty of early vegetables, marketing successfully those products himself. His father's farm is well stocked with fruit, and he has himself planted largely on his home place. He graduated from the State Agricultural College of Pennsylvania, June, 1890. He worked as Horticulturalist in the University of Tennessee and at their Experiment Station. He wrote Farmers' Bulletin No. 39, on Onions, of the U. S. Dept. of Agriculture For several years he was editor of the fruit and vegetable department of the Southern Florist and Gardener. He is now engaged in gardening, fruit culture, with a poultry plant to accommodate 500 hens.

Mr. T. E. Orr, Beaver, Pa., is an expert judge on poultry and live stock. Prof. James E. Rice, of Cornell University, says of him: "Mr. Orr is one of the strongest men of my acquaintance, who is working, writing, speaking along poultry lines. He is a good all round business man, level headed, splendid judgment, excellent speaker, tactful, and has had years of valuable experience, both as a poultry judge in the largest shows in the country, business manager of a leading agricultural paper and successful practical poultry man and farmer. His position as Secretary of the American Association of Poultry alone would be a splendid drawing card. He is so well and favorably known."

One of the special features this season will be the judging corn contest by boys over 15 and under 21, the successful exhibitor to be awarded a prize offered by the trustees of the Maryland Agricultural College, which is a two weeks' course at that Institution, board, lodging, and tuition free, to one boy from each county, who has exhibited and received the award, as outlined in the bulletin which we will forward you under separate cover, containing rules and explanation of points in corn judging, which you will find on page 17. Preparations were made for this work at our last meetings, when lectures were given by Mr. Llewllyn at the first session of each institute on judging and selecting corn, to the boys, followed by a week's course at the Summer School by Prof. Taliaferro and others. An assistant will accompany us, Mr. E. I. Oswald a former student of the Maryland Agricultural College, who will receive, arrange and judge the corn brought to the Institute for exhibition. He has been thoroughly trained in this work in his course at the institution.

Another feature of the program this season, will be to devote 15 minutes of each session to the instruction given at the Maryland Agricultural College and its departments, and it is earnestly requested that questions be asked and a thorough understanding arrived at by all who are interested in its important work. At best, the Institutes can only meet a partial want, while the College and Station work will go on forever.

Our meetings will be held at Grantsville, March 2nd, at Accident, March 4th, and at Oakland, March 6th and 7th. Mr. H. P. Miller, Grantsville, Mr. Fred Richter, Accident, and Mr. J. H. Conneway, Oakland, will act as our local correspondents.

We hope that our patrons will come prepared with questions and to enter into a discussion of subjects presented by the speakers. Every farmer should, by this time, realize that at these meetings he has met the best workers the country has, and that to absent himself but for a short time is at his personal loss. We therefore, earnestly request that the hours of the meeting be carefully observed, that no part of the program may be missed.

Thanking you for past favors, I am

Yours very truly,

WM. L. AMOSS, Director.

THE PLANS FOR NEW COURT HOUSE ADOPTED.

Commission Having Erection of Building In Charge Labored Earnestly.

Last Saturday plans for Garrett county's proposed new court house were adopted by the Commission created under the Act of the Assembly of Maryland which was passed at the last session of that body, the entire membership of the Commission with the exception of Associate Judge Keedy, of Hagerstown, being present, including Chief Judge A. Hunter Boyd, Associate Judge Robert R. Henderson, and the three members of the Board of County Commissioners. The other members of the Commission are State Senator W. McCulloh Brown, Capt. J. M. Jarboe and Mr. D. E. Offutt, of Oakland; Mr. C. M. Miller, of Swanton, and Mr. John W. McCullough, of Friendsville.

Plans for the proposed building were submitted by architects from Baltimore, Washington, Uniontown, St. Louis and New York. The Commission gave each of the plans before it thoughtful and serious consideration and arrived at a conclusion after nearly two days' work when they adopted the plan submitted by Messrs. Gordon, Tracy & Swartwout, of New York City.

The design for the new building is strictly classical and will probably be built of light colored brick with stone trimmings.

Mr. Gorden, of the architectural firm, who was in Oakland on Friday and Saturday, stated to the Commission that the building to be erected from the plans adopted can be completed for $70,000, which is within the sum contemplated by the Legislative act and adopted by the taxpayers last fall.

We had expected to be able to present to our readers this week a half tone engraving showing the perspective of the proposed building but up to the time of going to press it had not arrived. We fully expect to have it for printing in our next issue accompanied by a description of the interior arrangement of the structure.

A SUCCESSFUL LOCAL INSTITUTE.

Two Days' Session Largely Attended and Greatly Appreciated.

One of the most successful institutes which has ever been held at Oakland was in sesssion at the local school building on last Friday and Saturday. The program was filled with interesting and profitable surprises from the beginning to the close. To bring before the assembled teachers those ideas and suggestions which would help them in their work in the school room appears to have been the aim of each person who took part on the program.

Besides the technical subjects which were treated by the teachers, there were several addresses made by representative citizens who had for their key-note the desire to give the teachers something which would inspire and aid the teachers in their work. Among those who took such a part were Rev. Geo. C. Shaw, Mr. S. T. Jones and Mr. J. E. Harned. All of the numbers on the program which was published were given. At the close of the session Dr. Bartlett made an address which was filled with beautiful and inspiring thoughts; his address provided a fitting climax for the institute.

The following resolutions were passed by the institute:

In view of the interesting and helpful session of the local institute held at Oakland on Friday and Saturday, February 1st and 2nd respectively, the teachers who were in attendance feel that some form of expression should be given to their feelings of appreciation. Therefore, be it

RESOLVED, That thanks be tendered to Rev. Manges, Rev. Shaw, Mr. S. T. Jones and Mr. J. E. Harned for the great assistance they gave by their part of the program making the sessions of far greater interest and profit to the teachers; and be it

RESOLVED, That the action of the school board in lengthening the sessions of the local institutes to two days be heartily commended. It is also the sense of this institute that only those teachers who attend the sessions of the various institutes of the county both Friday and Saturday should receive their salary for Friday, only on the condition that they have been present on both days of the institute; be it further

RESOLVED, That the newspapers of Oakland be thanked for their liberality in giving so much space to articles on education which are read with great pleasure by those in this section who are interested in the development and improvement of the young men and women of this county.

Mrs. Silas E. Shirer went up to Grafton, West Va., Tuesday morning, being called thence by a message conveying word that her daughter Sue was quite ill at Grafton with what is supposed to be an attack of typhoid fever.

A MEETING FOR MEN TO BE HELD SUNDAY.

Dr. W. W. Davis Will Make Address. His Subject: Wanted—A Man.

The series of meetings which have been in progress in St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland for the past two or three weeks, continue to grow in interest, strong sermons being preached nightly by the ministers. Rev. J. B. Workman, pastor of St. Paul's, is in charge of the meetings, and is ably assisted by Presiding Elder Dr. R. B. Ward, Dr. W. W. Davis and others.

A number of men and women have professed conversion and several accessions to the church have resulted.

Beginning on last Monday night all the stores, shops and other places of business closed at the hour of 6.30 in order that those engaged may be permitted to attend the services.

The services will be indefinitely prolonged and what promises to be the most interesting meeting of the series is that sceduled for next Sunday afternoon at half past three when Dr. W. W. Davis of the Park, will address a meeting for men only, the subject of Dr. Davis' discourse being: "Wanted—A Man."

Many printed invitations to attend the Sunday afternoon meeting have been sent and handed around by the members and friends of the church and in consequence a large congregation of men is expected to be present. The sermons preached by Dr. Davis to Oakland auditors have been well received by them and as a pulpit orator he is esteemed very highly.

The music for this meeting will be in charge of a male quartet and several special numbers will be rendered.

Dr. J. M. Blose, of the Blose School of Music, East Wheeling street, has been chosen to the position of dean of the music faculty and director of the music at Mt. Lake Park for the Chautauqua next summer, August 2-28. This will be an unusually interesting session of this Chautauqua, as it will mark its silver anniversary. The annual conference of the students of the missionary volunteer movement is to be held there during August and a fine male chorus is assured for that occasion. Miss Ethal Blose, daughter of Dr. Blose, will be the concert pianist and accompanist.—Washington (Pa.) Reporter.

STRUCK BY TRAIN; AND NOW A COUNTY CHARGE.

A Stranger Hailing From Wisconsin Seriously Hurt Last Monday.

An eastbound freight train on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad last Monday about noon, struck and seriously injured a man giving his name as Michael Welch, who stated that his home is in Wisconsin and that by occupation he is a lumberman.

The man, according to the statement of the trainmen, was standing on the track, having stepped from one track to another to avoid a westbound freight train and was unaware of the approarh of the second train which bore down upon him with considerable speed. He was hurled with much force into the air and struck a car of the westbound train and then fell limply between the tracks, where he was picked up by the train crew and brought to the office of Dr. Henry W. McComas who treated his injuries, and later taken to the hospital ward in the County Jail where he has been under treatment at the public's expense.

The man's injuries are composed of a serious scalp wound and an injury to his side. He is rapidly recovering and will be discharged within a week or two.

WILSON.

The recent cold snap made the ice men here smile, but they did not get very much put up.

Mr. Wallace Mosser and Mr. Bert Wilson left yesterday for an extended trip to Florida.

Mr. Andy Johnson, of Wildell, is visiting his sister, Mrs. Bert Wilson.

Mr. and Mrs. Clint Williams of this place, are visiting Mrs. William's sister at Fairfax, Mrs John Hamill.

Mr. R. P. Davis is confined to his home with a very serious attack of rheumatism.

Mrs. William Timmerman is also on the sick list.

We are glad to see our friend Mr. Charles Blamble out again.

Mr. Groundhog came out and took a sun bath Saturday. Guess he will stay in for six weeks.

Mr. Allen Wheeler is going to move from here to Wildell in the near future. We are sorry to see him leave. We wish him success in his new enterprise.

The Daughter

By FRANK H. SWEET

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet

THERE was the usual morning bustle around the small station at Finley. On the platform were long lines of neatly packed crates and orange boxes, and among them the owners, with stencils and paint pots, making sure that their markings were all right.

Presently there were a roar and a quiver, and the great engine rushed by and came to a slow stop as the passenger cars glided opposite the platform.

Among those to alight was a young girl of seventeen or eighteen, plainly but expensively dressed, and with a bright, eager air of expectation. A quick glance about the platform brought a shade of disappointment to her face. After a moment's hesitation she approached a man in shirt sleeves and broad, low, flapping hat who was leaning against some orange boxes he had just finished marking.

"Can you direct me to Mr. John Austin's place?" she asked.

"Mr.—John—Austin," he repeated reflectively. "Why, no, I don't— Oh, yes, of course—Boozy John." He stopped abruptly as he noticed the inquiring look on her face. "I—I—yes, I reckon I know. Are you some o' his kin?"

"I am his daughter," she replied, wondering a little at the startled whistle which came to his lips and which she noticed he choked back apologetically. "I have been at a boarding school ever since I was a little girl. This is my first visit to Florida."

"An' does your paw, Mr.—John—Austin, know you're comin'?"

"No, but I haven't heard from him in almost a year. Father doesn't like to write, but he never allowed my letters to go unanswered so long before. I feared something might be the matter with him or the boys, and he wouldn't tell. I just had to come. I am so glad that you know him." She hesitated and then asked in a lower voice, as though she feared her question would be answered in the negative, "Is he—well?"

"Yes, fur as sickness goes, your paw's one o' the ruggedes' an' healthies' men I know. I 'low he an' the boys never had a sickness in all their born days. They're puffectly well, all on 'em. I know, for their place jines mine."

"Why, really?" Her face grew radiant. "Their nearest neighbor! And you know the boys and all about them? Dear little fellows! It seems strange that I should never have seen them. You see, when we left Iowa father sent me to the boarding school and then came south. That was twelve years ago, and I have been at the school ever since. Little Tommy is almost nine, and Fred—let me see—Fred is seven. Is the place far?" eagerly.

"'Bout half a mile."

"Well, of course, I can go with you. I'll run and see about my baggage and be back directly. Won't they be surprised?" And, leaving him staring blankly at a knothole in the platform, she hurried away to look after her trunk and valise.

Half a minute passed, then the man raised his head with a dismal, expressive whistle. It was echoed by another, equally expressive, from the other side of the orange boxes.

"CAN YOU DIRECT ME TO MR. JOHN AUSTIN'S PLACE?"

"Waal, you're in it now, for a fact," said the owner of the second whistle sarcastically. "What you goin' to do 'bout it?"

"Lord only knows," groaned the man in the shirt sleeves. "Reckon mebbe I'll have to tell her."

"Reckon mebbe you will," dryly.

"How could I," indignantly, "an' she almost the same age as my C'indy? Land's sake alive, man, d'ye s'pose I was such a brute as to tell her that Mr.—John—Austin wa'n't nobody but Boozy John, not fitten to be father to nobody, an' that he'd been sent to prison most a year ago for stealin', an' that the boys was in the poorhouse an' that the place wa'n't wuth the bringin' out of an auctioneer to sell it? For the land's sake, Thompson, tell me what am I to do?" appealingly.

"Jest give it to her straight. That's what I'd do. You're too all fired chicken hearted, Williams. H'sh! Here she comes now."

"Your landscapes are so quaint and beautiful," she said, with flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes. "I know I shall like to live here. Well, I am all ready. Can you take my trunk and valise in your wagon?"

"Yes," gruffly. He was glad to get away from her, and he made the work of transferring the baggage as long as possible. Somehow he could not bring himself to tell her the whole brutal truth. If it had not been his money that had been stolen and if he had not been the one who had complained of the worthless drunkard it would have been less difficult. He had been sorry for his justifiable act ever since he made the complaint, and now— Well, he would take the girl home to his wife. She had more tact than he and would know just what to do.

MADE THE WORK LAST AS LONG AS POSSIBLE.

This mental throwing of the responsibility from his own shoulders brought back his natural cheerfulness and buoyancy, and he smilingly motioned for the girl to climb into his wagon.

"Ever ride after a mule before?" he asked as he left the animal's head and climbed up on the seat beside her.

"No." Then her face grew wistful. "Do you suppose father and the boys are at home today?"

"I 'low they won't be there jest right now," he said evasively. "You see, they didn't know you was comin', so they happen to be off for a spell. But you mustn't let it put you out any," with more animation. "I'll take you home, an' my wife'll fix you up mighty comf'table till they git back."

"Thank you. But why can't I go right to the house and wait for them? It would be such a surprise."

"No, no!" he objected, with sudden entreaty. "By no manner o' means. Bachelor livin' ain't apt to keep a house fixed up, an' jest now 'tain't in place for you. I know that. You must do jest like I say an' come to my house for a spell."

"Well, if you think best." She was silent for some time, watching the unfamiliar plants along the roadside and the curious, bright colored chameleons that flashed from the warm sand in front of the mule and disappeared with marvelous rapidity among the palmettos.

"Cur'us, ain't they?" said Williams as he followed her glance. "Jest like a bit o' rainbow strung on lightnin'. But they're 'mazin' fine things for pets. Your brother Freddy used to have one that would scoot out from some queer hidin' place whenever he'd whistle. Great hand, Freddy, for pets."

At the mention of Freddy she lost interest in the plants and chameleons and turned to him with a tender, tremulous smile on her lips.

"It will be so pleasant to have one's own folks to live with," she said softly. "They were all nice to me at the school, but none of them belonged to me. It will be almost like—like heaven to live in the same house with father and the boys."

Williams reached out and struck his mule viciously, but she did not notice.

"I suppose everybody round here likes father, he is such a good man," she went on in a tone that was an assertion rather than a question.

"He kept you to school pretty steady," returned her companion. "I knew he had a gal up north, but had an idee she was stayin' 'mong her kin."

"Father has done everything for me—everything," said the girl, with a tender light in her big gray eyes. "He was not rich, for he once wrote that I might have to wait a few days for my year's tuition, as money was hard to get. But it came the very next day, and he always sent me plenty for books and dresses and everything I wanted. He wrote for me never to stint myself on anything and that after I graduated I was on no account to come home, but to keep on with my music and drawing and other studies, and when I had learned all I could at the school he was going to send me to Europe to learn more. Dear, dear father! I hope I may be able to make it up to him some time."

Williams gave a quick sidelong glance at the earnest face and then gazed steadfastly at the road ahead. He had known Boozy John for eight years and could not remember a single redeeming feature about the man. He was erratic, shiftless and utterly irresponsible. His life was one long spree that reeled between absolute drunkenness and semi-intoxication. But he was a good lawyer and fine scholar and even in his partial stupor was able to pick up a good deal of money about the courts and in other ways. People supposed that all this money went to the dramshops, and the supposition made them regard the man with extreme disgust, for his house was a mere hovel and his boys wholly neglected and uncared for.

When they reached the vine covered cottage in front of his orange grove he carried in the trunk and valise and presently called his wife aside and made a whispered explanation. Then he went to the barn to unharness his mule. But he made a much longer job of it than was necessary, and when it was finished he leaned upon his fence and gazed with unobservant eyes at his fields of sweet potatoes and pineapples and bananas. His wife came to him there.

"Did you tell her?" he asked.

"Yes," in a low voice. He noticed that her lips trembled.

"Take it hard?"

"She's high strung, Jim, an' that kind o' folks mostly take things hard, but they don't make a show. She wouldn't b'lieve me at first, an' when she did she turned white an' stared at nothin' till I—I jest bust out cryin' myself. Seemed like I never felt so sorry for anybody in all my life."

The two stood there nearly half an hour; then the girl left the house and passed down the road on the opposite side of the fence.

"She's goin' over to look at her house now," said Mrs. Williams in a low voice. "I told her 'twan't fit to live in, but she said they'd lived in it an' she could. An' when I told her as how we 'lowed on keepin' her awhile she jest thanked me an' shook her head."

When the girl came back they were on the piazza. She went directly to Williams.

"When does my father come home?" she asked.

"His time's out—er—that is, he'll come home in 'bout three months."

"And how much does he owe you?"

"Oh, nothin', nothin' at all," hastily.

"How much does he owe you?" the girl repeated in a tone that he felt could not be disregarded.

"Waal, $50. But you needn't bother 'bout payin' it."

"I cannot just at present, but everything must be straightened out before father comes home. There must not be a single thing to worry him. And now can I get you to go after my brothers? I shall fix up the house, and we will live there until father comes."

"I JEST BUST OUT CRYIN' MYSELF."

"It's quite a long drive," said Williams reflectively. "I can go tomorrow."

"That will do." She stood gazing out at the vista of pines and palmettos afforded by an opening in the clambering vines, her face white and stricken, but calm with a strong, determined purpose.

"What kind of employment is there here for girls?" she asked.

Williams looked dubious.

"I don't reckon there's any," he answered. "Stores gen'rally git men clerks, an' there's ten applicants to one job. Folks round here don't hire much help."

"I must have work now. Father must not find anything against him when he comes home. Do you think I can get washing?"

Mrs. Williams looked at her blankly.

"It's darkies' work," she objected.

"It's work that I will do gladly if I can get it," a sudden passionate sob bringing the color back to her cheeks. "I will scrub floors—anything that will help father a little. He has been working and making sacrifices for years that I might remain at school, and I—I never suspected. I ought to have been here, watching him and caring for him and the boys."

It was nearly two months later before Williams again encountered Thompson on the station platform.

"Waal, how'd ye make out with Boozy John's fine darter?" Thompson asked.

Williams looked up from the box he was marking.

"That's jest what she is," he said—"Boozy John's fine darter. I've been round with her consider'ble lately; down to the prison twice to see her paw a; took her to town several times in my waggin. At first her paw was all broke up—never wanted her to know how low down he was, I s'pose. But she brought him round, an' now he can't keep his eyes off her when she's nigh. Soon's he's out they're goin' over an' take up a homestead in Hernandy county, twenty miles or more from town, I b'lieve, on account o' his failin', and I reckon she or the boys 'll do all the tradin'. Boozy John ain't much of a man an' never can be, but I tell you," impressively, "jest all the man there is in him that gal's goin' to bring out. Mark my words on that."

There Was Method In Hubby's Rashness

FOR years poor, overworked Jenkins had registered his nightly "kick" against the incessant playing of the piano by his two girls, aged respectively sixteen and seventeen. He needed rest and quiet, he said, but the madam couldn't see it that way, being most desirous that the girls should have "as much practice as possible."

About 1 o'clock the other night Jenkins was suddenly awakened by his wife's exclaiming in a hoarse tone that she was sure there were burglars in the parlor.

"Nonsense!" growled Jenkins, turning over preparatory to renewing his slumbers.

"But, Richard," insisted the wife, "I am sure I heard men in the parlor. Some one stumbled against the piano several times, striking the keys!"

Whereupon Jenkins, with a demoniacal smile, hastily leaped from the bed and began to slip on his dressing gown, evidently with the intention of immediately interviewing the nocturnal visitors downstairs. Observing his determined air, Mrs. Jenkins began to be uneasy.

"Oh, Richard," she wailed, "don't, for my sake, do anything rash! Remember your family! Don't be rash!"

"Rash!" scornfully repeated Jenkins. "Depend upon it, I shall do nothing rash! I'm going to help those fellows. You don't suppose that they can get that piano out unassisted, do you?"—Lippincott's.

Self Convicted.

"Why deny it?" he insisted. "It is because some gossip intimates that I am not true to you that you have broken our engagement?"

"Oh, no," she replied. "It is because I believe you truthful that I am breaking it."

"How do you mean?"

"Well, you remember you have frequently told me that you were not worthy of me."—Catholic Standard and Times.

Realistic.

"How long were you on the raft and without food?"

"Three days and nights."

"And how did you ever stand it?"

"Oh, all right! I made myself believe I was at home, that we had no maid and my wife was doing the cooking."—New York Life.

Their Silver Anniversary.

'Twas just about six months or less since
Jinks had wed his wife.
She was a shrew—'y golly day, they lived an awful life!
She'd been as nice as pie to him till she had got him cinched,
Yet they had scarcely left the church ere they fell out and clinched.
From then until our tale begins was one
unending scrap,
Although in single life he'd been a quiet loving chap.
He called her "vixen," "spitfire," "cat;"
she called him "Satan's spawn;"
They jawed from dawn to set of sun,
from sunset back to dawn.

One day when half a year had passed and found them still at war,
When Jinks had long been wondering what he was living for,
He made a friendly overture to her he aye was dreading,
Suggesting that they issue cards anent
their silver wedding.
The shrew, wrath mingled with amaze,
demanded what he meant,
As but a poor half dozen months their fortunes had been blent.
His answer came in accents meek: "Forgive, I pray you, dear.
I'd merely notched my walking stick each time it seemed a year."

Inconsistencies of Our Prison Discipline

Copyright by Rockwood, New York.

....By....
Mrs. FLORENCE MAYBRICK,
Once Under Sentence of Death

I CLAIM for all men human rights, the right to sunshine, to ordinary decencies, TO LABOR Prisoners realize some things cannot be bettered and put up with them. But at Sing Sing strong men are shut up in cells six feet by three, without ventilation, sanitary provisions or water, for thirteen hours a day. I KNOW WHAT IT MEANS. In England for nine months I had solitary confinement in a cell seven feet by four, with a log for a seat and my food passed in through a trap in the door.

THEY DO THESE THINGS FOR THE SALVATION OF SOULS; THEY LEAD TO DAMNATION.

At Trenton, N. J., they still have underground dungeons where not even the step of the warder can be heard. As I visited them I heard a poor man call: "For the love of God let me out. I have been here five days and CAN'T BEAR IT any longer." Yet as I came up I heard a sound I had never heard in a prison before.

"Yes," said the warder, "that's our string band practicing."

Then their apple dumplings! In England it was beef and mutton, mutton and beef, with bread and cheese on Sunday to save the staff. Why, once one of the official visitors came to our kitchen and spied a single chop. He flew into a rage and threatened to report the matron, the warders, the governor and everybody to the home office FOR WASTING THE TAXPAYERS' MONEY on the scum of the earth. And at Trenton they have apple dumplings!

Ten thousand boys under sixteen years of age are sent to jail for misdemeanors, not for crime. One-half of the inmates of our prisons are under twenty-five years. Why should they be forced to herd with HARDENED CRIMINALS? We need a special penitentiary for them. One keeper said to me: "Don't worry about them. They're a worthless lot." They are not. When you hear a boy in his cell, as I have done, crying for his father, you can do something for HIM. But it depends a good deal on the personality of the wardens. Too many of them need reforming THEMSELVES. They are often in charge of prisoners better than themselves. We need a SCHOOL for prison officers.

IN ENGLAND THEY HAVE ONE NOW, AND I HAVE EXPERIENCED ITS VALUE. MY FIRST YEARS IN PRISON UNDER UNTRAINED OFFICERS WERE SIMPLY TORTURE. MY LAST FIVE UNDER WARDERS WHO HAD BEEN THROUGH THE SCHOOL WERE AT ANY RATE HUMAN.

Railroad and Public Should Be Coworkers

By B. F. YOAKUM, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Rock Island System

BETTER understanding and closer co-operation between transportation companies and the merchants and farmers whom they serve would have a more wholesome effect toward stopping the present unnecessary agitation than ANYTHING THAT CAN BE DONE. A corporation whose management is closely identified and stands ON FRIENDLY TERMS with the citizens of the communities and whose agents and employees are courteous and attentive in dealing with its patrons has an asset of INESTIMABLE VALUE.

A railroad which enjoys the friendship of its patrons is benefited in many ways, and such a relation is almost essential to successfully carry on the work of the great corporations of the country, whose owners and managers have, unfortunately, during the past few years drifted away from DIRECT CONTACT with the public which they serve and to which they look for their revenue.

Often, when thinking of present conditions, I recall the time when the station agent was known personally TO EVERY MAN IN HIS TOWN. The citizens came down to the depot in the morning or evening and saluted the agent in a most familiar way.

My idea is that the old familiarity can be RE-ESTABLISHED. The station agent can be acquainted with everybody in his town. The official can be familiar with affairs in EVERY PLACE ON HIS ROAD, and he can be personally known to the public of his line's territory.

When a planter has a bale of cotton to ship, he goes first to the representative of a railroad. It is to his interest to know the line's local representative, as it is to the agent's interest to know him. What I wish to imply is that friendly relations such as formerly existed would be good for the public AND GOOD FOR THE RAILROAD.

That part of the prevailing agitation which is unnecessary or unwarranted could be obliterated through a better understanding and closer co-operation between railroads and the public.

IT IS CLEAR TO ME THAT A RETURN TO FORMER RELATIONS WOULD BE BENEFICIAL TO THE RAILROADS. AND I AM AS FIRMLY CONVINCED THAT IT WOULD PROMOTE THE PUBLIC INTEREST.

Rich Men Should Be Liberal

By ADOLPHUS BUSCH, Multimillionaire Brewer, St. Louis

IF there were not so many stingy wealthy men in the United States, every man with a decent income would be paying his FAIR PROPORTION of government taxes.

A MAN WITH A GREAT DEAL OF MONEY IS SO FORTUNATE THAT I BELIEVE HE SHOULD BE RESPECTABLY LIBERAL.

Now, I don't want to decry men for thrift. We can't have TOO MUCH of it in this country. But this thing of the wealthy man objecting every time the government wants to impose a tax that may affect his income is silly and SHORTSIGHTED.

CONCERNING GOOD ROADS.

It is gratifying to observe that the good roads gospel, which has been so assiduously preached for years by a few, seems to be taking deep root in the popular sentiment. The early apostles of the movement predicted that a few roads constructed according to approved scientific principles would cause discontent with the old order and spread the leaven of desire for better ways, and it seems that they were correct. Those who have been so unlucky as to be compelled to travel over any of the dirt roads of the county within the past few weeks have had another powerful object lesson, and if their trips have been partly made over some of the few really good roads the contrast has made the lesson still stronger.

Probably every taxpayer realizes that good roads cost money, and that to secure them more money must be expended for road purposes than is being done now or has been done in the past. But it should be remembered that a large amount of the road money is now being wasted by being expended in alleged repairs of dirt roads through the hands of unskilled or grafting supervisors. Many of the road menders seem to regard their appointment merely as a "snap" gained through political "pull," which enables them to work out their tax bills, and the work is done negligently, carelessly and dishonestly. Others conscientiously put in plenty of hard work, but, being apparently ignorant of the first principles of engineering, perform their labor in such a way that in many cases it would be better for the road if they would stay off it and quietly appropriate the money for their own uses. Even when the work is conscientiously and intelligently done, the repair of dirt roads is a most expensive business, because the results are so temporary. Therefore, if the money which is now wasted on dirt roads could be saved it would form a splendid nucleus of a fund for more permanent improvements.

The only other proposition for an increase in the road fund which need be considered just now is that to increase the levy for road purposes. This the County Commissioners have the power to do. The Commissioners are not mind-readers and they have no possible means of knowing what the taxpayers want unless the latter tell them about it. This can be done by word of mouth, or those who do not find it convenient to wait upon the Commissioners at their office or who do not often come in contact with them in their daily affairs may write letters and circulate and sign petitions. The Commissioners have the power to levy a still higher tax upon petition of two-fifths of the taxpayers of any given section and after public notice given, but while this might do very well for a single neighborhood or a closely settled district, it would be a very cumbersome and difficult plan of operation for the whole county. Other projects for raising more money, such as increasing the rate for road purposes to fifty cents or floating a bond issue, must have legislative sanction before they can be put into operation, and this can not be obtained until next year. The bonding plan seems to be unpopular, but discussion of this may be reserved until later. Therefore, as the levy must be closed in about a month, the best mode of procedure would apparently be to urge an immediate increase in the road levy.

It is worth noting that the State tax rate will be decreased this year from twenty-three and a-half cents to sixteen cents, and that even if ten cents additional should be levied this year for road purposes, unless the county budget is increased from other causes, the taxpayer's bill would be but very slightly larger than it was last year.

But, first, last and all the time, it must be borne in mind that no matter how much money we raise for good roads and no matter how we raise it, a large part will be wasted if it is expended under the present system and the proposed immediate increase, if apportioned under the present law, would be of very little help in improving the roads in the more sparsely settled districts. These considerations lead to the belief that if an increase in the tax rate is to be made, ten cents is sufficient to risk at present and that a determined effort should be made to have the control of the roads and road money placed in the hands of a real road commission, non-partisan or bi-partisan in its character, which would act with a sole regard to the welfare of the taxpayers and without reference to the political fortunes of individuals.

HUTTON.

Miss Mary Canty has just returned from a week's visit in Cumberland.

We enjoyed Mr. Kelso's letter last week. Give us another, Mr. Kelso.

The local mills have moved more lumber to the railroad in the past week than during any month before in the year past.

Schools are open again, after a temperary closing on accunt of illness of teachers.

Ernest Townshend, of Oakland, is in town overhauling the electric light plant of the Garrett Leather Company.

Mr. Max Jarboe and Miss Nellie Jarboe, of Oakland, are visiting at C. F. White's.

Mr. James W. Beeghly, secretary and treasurer of the Garrett County Telephone Company, was in Oakland Tuesday and yesterday on business connected with his company.

For Thin Babies

Fat is of great account to a baby; that is why babies are fat. If your baby is scrawny, Scott's Emulsion is what he wants. The healthy baby stores as fat what it does not need immediately for bone and muscle. Fat babies are happy; they do not cry; they are rich; their fat is laid up for time of need. They are happy because they are comfortable. The fat surrounds their little nerves and cushions them. When they are scrawny those nerves are hurt at every ungentle touch. They delight in Scott's Emulsion. It is as sweet as wholesome to them.

ANOTHER LETTER FROM NEW MEXICO.

Mr. E. W. Kelso Describes the Country Which He Is Visiting.

To the Editor of The Repubblican:

Since my last letter to THE REPUBLICAN I visited the immediate country around Las Cruces for information concerning various industries and educational advantages.

Three miles from this place is located the territorial agricultural college with three hundred students enrolled. Besides all matters pertaining to agriculture, courses of music, languages, engineering, sciences, domestic economy, business, etc., are offered.

In the town of Las Cruces is the Loretto Academy, a school for girls, with about 300 in attendance. Las Cruces also has two large and modern public school buildings.

I visiting several orchards and vineyards, some containing forty acres. I also saw several apiaries. One man sold over $3,000 worth of honey in one season. Most of the honey is made from alfalfa and mesquite bloom.

I visiting a feeding ranch containing six hundred cattle. The feed consists of alfalfa cut by steam power into suitable length and afterwards mixed dry with cotton seed meal. This is put into large feed boxes place about the lot on posts. Water for stock is pumped by windmills. The proprietor explained that he had a herd of 7,000 cattle on the range thirty miles distant, and that he takes from the herd the inferior cattle and fattens them for market, and keeps the best cattle on the range. He stated that he had recently bought one hundred head of thorough-bred Herford males to turn with his range cattle in order to improve his stock.

I am told that there are several large flocks of goats on the ranges near here. Goats are very profitable, and there is less risk in raising them than sheep.

The soil in the valley is of two kinds:, adobe and sandy. The adobe soil is formed of the silt in the river water. Every time the land is irrigated there is deposited a thin layer of soil—sediment from the river. The soil is thus constantly renewed and remains fertile. The sandy soil is better adapted for truck farming.

Unimproved valley lands sell from $10 to $25 an acre; improved, from $25 to $150. Much of the unimproved land is covered with small mesquite which has large roots. These roots are sold for fire wood and the proceeds often pays for clearing the land. The surface of the ground in many places is uneven and requires considerable labor to put it in condition to irrigate. Land to be easily irrigated should be level or nearly so.

Farmers do their planting here in January and February. Crops planted later do not do as well. Water is obtained at a depth of fifteen to thirty feet.

Wages are good. Carpenters receive 50 to 75 cents; bricklayers 75 cents; plasterers 75 cents; stone masons 50 to 75 cents an hour; common laborers $1 per day.

Some of the Mexicans are very wealthy. But some of those of the lower class consider themselves rich if they have a sack of flour, a dollar's worth of meat, fifty cents worth of tobacco, and a little child.

There are several valuable mines in this vicinity. Three or four are now producing. One has a record of over a million dollars. This mine produces lead and silver. Copper is found in abundance. It requires a large capital to develop a copper mine. Some of the best paying copper mines in the world required the expenditure of millions of dollars to put them on a paying basis. The longer a good copper mine is worked the more valuable it becomes. If the proper amount of development work were done here New Mexico would rival Arizona in the production of copper. There are hundreds of prospects not now producing, some of which may yet develop into valuable properties. The ore from these mines is hauled to Las Cruces, and from there shipped to the smelter in El Paso.

In company with my son we took a day's pleasure trip to the mountains. Reaching the base we proceeded up a canon, the perpendicular walls on each side towering 2000 feet. The trail up the canon is very difficult to climb. At times we climbed on our hands and knees, and then again our hands and feet, seeking a safe foothold in the niches in the rock. Mountain climbing where a misstep or a slip of the foot may cause a fall into the yawning chasm below is very exciting. A small stream of water came dashing down the precipice, leaping from rock to rock. At the foot of one of the cataracts is a pool about one hundred feet in circumference. The water is clear as crystal and cold as ice.

When viewing this grand scenery we are impressed with its sublimity, the greatness of the handiwork of the Creator, and in comparison how weak and insignificent is man. To the east of us one peak rears its bald top 9000 feet high, above which we could see several large eagles soaring. To the east of this mountain the Sacramento range some forty miles distant could be seen covered with snow. This range is covered with timber, and there is sufficent rain for farming without irrigation.

So much has come under my observation since coming here that I can only give a brief sketch of what I have seen. I wish to add that during my visit here we have had bright sunshine every day, just the kind of weather that is advertised. On the date which the temperature was 18 degree below zero in Oakland, we had only a light frost.

E. W. KELSO.

Las Cruces, New Mexico, Jan. 30, 1907.

New Building for the Park.

On last Friday the Mountain Lake Park Association awarded a contract to Mr. W. T. Sigler, of Piedmont West Va., for the erection of a new office building at the Park to occupy the present site of the postoffice building at that point. The new building will be two stories high and will be 35x66 feet. It will contain rooms for the postoffice, store and restaurant on the second floor, which will be on a level with the railroad, while below will be warerooms and offices. The structure will be of frame with a slate roof.

THE B. & O. R. R.

Instructs Ticket Agents and Passenger Conductors to Comply With Rate Bill.

The operating and general departments of the Baltimore & Ohio railroad, including the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern railroad, have sent out a circular letter to all ticket agents and passenger conductors impressing upon them the importance of strictly complying with the provisions of the Hepburn rate bill and forbidding any deviation from the passenger rates fixed by the tariff. They are told that there must not be a single exception to the prescribed rates and that the railroad company, its officers, agents or other employes willfully violating the law, or willfully permitting the same to be done are subject to a fine of from $1000 to $20,000 for each offence in addition to imprisonment for two years. It explains that the same penalties are levied against passengers for any willful act whereby they secure transportation at less than tariff rates.

In concluding the circular, the instruction is given:

"The provisions of this law must be strictly observed by everyone concerned in selling tickets or collecting fares."

Notice to Taxpayers.

Notice is hereby given to the taxpayers of Garrett county that their State and county taxes are due and payable and that the law makes it incumbent upon me to enforce collection of the same by advertisement and sale unless the same be paid immediately.

All who are in arrears for taxes will please bear this in mind and make settlement.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is:

AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busless, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

Young lady, don't grab at the first pair of good looking clothes that comes along and say, "It's mine, because I found it," but wait until a sure enough man comes along. He may not be as Johnny on the spot as the other kind, but he will be there when the other one has made you tired and passed on.

Mrs. Kittie B. Arnold, of Mountain Lake Park, where she has been a resident for several months, left Oakland Tuesday being accompanied by her two children, for Corsicana, Texas, where Mrs. Arnold will continue her profession as a trained nurse. Gov. A. B. Fleming and G. W. Fleming left yesterday for Columbus, Ohio, called by the illness of Mrs. Brooks Fleming, who has been ill of typhoid fever for several weeks at the home of her parents in that city. While Mrs. Fleming's illness has been serious from the first, a slight change for the better had given more hope for her recovery. Later, however, she developed pleurisy and her condition now is very grave.—Fairmont West Virginian.

The postal authorities at Washington recognizing the liability of postmasters to make mistakes in getting letters in the wrong boxes, have fixed a penalty of 200 dollars on persons taking mail out of the office other than their own and not returning it at once. This law also includes newspapers. The excuses that it is the postmaster's fault "cuts no ice." If you have been getting other people's mail you had better take warning or you may get yourself in trouble.

Garrett countains are now enjoying the first real bit of winter so far this season, snow having fallen to a depth of about ten inches, beginning on last Sunday evening and on Monday and Tuesday it continued to fall. While it may inconvenience some people, especially those connected with railroads, it is much better to have snow than rain. Along the streets of Oakland great piles are to be seen everywhere, but everybody you meet seems happy. The pavements have been kept practically clean by "Uncle Abe" Wotring with his snow plow and his faithful horse. That snow plow is a great invention.

Can anything be more pleasant in the busy hum-drum of after years than to permit your minds to wander back to the days of school life; the sweet memories and incidents that will come up, the smiling faces and pleasant countenances; the old school house door that had so often admitted you, swinging back and forth on its hinges, the very walks speaking forth of happy hours; while at your side stands the noble teacher who watched your every move and was as much interested in your success as you were yourself. As these recollections come back to you whose school lives have been spent in this community, your eyes will moisten as you realize those days are now gone forever. Never again will those days return. You who for so many months and years have been like one family and participated joyously together in the school room and play-ground have doubtless pledged loyalty and faith to the school. You now step out of school life into life's school and will be scattered far and wide, but the memories of your school days will ever form the brightest link in your chain of thought.

Mr. James M. Litzinger, editor of the Grafton Leader, who recently jumped into prominence in his native city when he was sued for the paltry sum of five thousand simoleans by the High Mayor of that city, was in Oakland yesterday on business. "Jim" does not seem to be at all worried by the pending suit or the outcome when it is tried in the court at Grafton. A country editor nowadays to be kept prominently before the public must have from one to six suits pending, the amount of damages claimed being a small matter. just so they don't run up into the millions, for editors generally have large bank accounts, are the owners of government bonds and the great amount of financial stocks they control will generally tide them over in libel matters.

Learn to laugh. A good laugh is better than medicine. Learn how to tell a story. A well told story is a welcome sunbeam in a sick room. The world is too busy to care for your ills and sorrows. Learn to keep your own troubles to yourself. Learn to stop croaking. If you cannot see any good in the world, keep the bad to yourself. Learn to hide your pains and aches under pleasant smiles. No one cares whether you have the ear ache, headache, or rheumatism. Don't cry. Tears do well enough in novels but are out of place in real life. Learn to meet your friends with a smile. A good humored man or woman is always welcome, but the dyspeptic is not wanted anywhere and is a nuisance as well. Above all, give pleasure. Lose no chance of giving pleasure. You will pass through this world but once. Any good thing, therefore, that you can show to any human being, you had better do now; do not defer or neglect it, for you will not pass this way again.

Said a well known business man to us the other day: "It would not hurt you to occasionally mention our business in your paper. It would help to fill up you know." Yes, we might do it. We havn't the least idea on earth that it would hurt us, and it would, as he suggests, fill up. We might do all this, but at the same time we do not have to do it, unless we feel like it. It would not hurt him, either, to come around and say: "Give me a column or a half column of space for an advertisement, and here is the money for it." By doing this he would become a deserter to that grand army of deadheads who expect the newspapers to continually note the improvements they make, by giving them free puffs, and for which they never pay a cent. It is high time for all classes to learn that a newspaper is a business enterprise, the same as a dry goods store or grocery, run for a living for its owner.—Lanark (Ill.) Gazette.

Piano for School Purchased.

Last Friday the committee having in charge the purchase of a piano for the High School of Oakland selected a very fine instrument and had it installed in the school building. Considerable competition was manifested by the agents of the manufacturers who sent three instruments here for examination by the committee with the result that a high-class instrument was purchased at an exceedingly low price.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARTHA V. SCHELL.

Died, at her home in Mt. Lake Park, after a long illness of tuberculosis, Mrs. Martha V. Schell, wife of Mr. Leonard Schell, aged 50 years, 2 months and 18 days. Mrs. Schell was born near Maysville, W. Va., Nov. 13, 1856, and died Feb. 1, 1907. She leaves behind to mourn her loss her husband and two children, Effa V., and Roy, and a host of friends. Mrs. Schell moved to this county several years ago and has made many friends during her stay here. She lived a consistent christian for several years; she was a dear wife, a loving mother and a kind friend. She died leaving a hope with those surrounding her bedside that she is now enjoying eternal happiness.

The funeral services were conducted at the home by the Rev. Van Amburg, of Pittsburg, Pa., interment being made in the Wonderly burying ground.

She is gone but not forgotten
By the friends she left behind,
And is singing with the angels
In her heavenly home on high.

W. N. W.

MRS. LAURA DURST-BAKER.

Death has claimed another from our midst. Mrs. Henry Baker, nee Laura Durst, daughter of the late Winfield S. Durst, died at her home in Grantsville, Wednesday, January 30th, 1907.

She was young in years,—had not quite reached twenty seven. Her death was due to an internal growth. She was united in marriage to Henry Baker October 2nd, 1904.

It is sad indeed for her mother as well as her husband. Her father preceded her to the better country less than five months ago.

The funeral services were held in the Grantsville M. E. church, conducted by her pastor, Rev. McCoy. Interment was made in the Blocher cemetery near Mt. Zion February 1st.

Mrs. Baker was in act, word and deed a true christian. She left the assurance with her friends that she was going to dwell with Jesus and her loved father. How grateful her dear husband and mother must have felt to see her so resigned and happy in the thought that although her loss would cast a shadow on their lives on earth, they would meet her hereafter in that better world where no trouble or sorrow is to be found. Truly we live in a world where solemn shadows are continually falling on our path, shadows that teach us the insecurity of all temporal blessings and warn us that here "there is no abiding stay." May hope and faith mingle with her loved ones' sorrow that they may look to that future where the sundered ties of earth are reunited. The friends of the deceased have the deepest sympathy of the community and indeed, many mourn with them.

Mrs. Baker seemed almost as near as a sister to some of us.
We saw not the angels who met her there
The gates of the City we could not see
But we know she is safe on the other side
Where all the ransomed and angels be.

A. M.

ADAM WARNER, SR.

Mr. Adam Warner, Sr., died on last Thursday at the home of Mr. Jacob Steinla, in District No. 9 of this county. Mr. Warner was upwards of eighty-five years of age and is survived by several sons and daughters. The funeral took place on Saturday afternoon from Greeneville church with interment in the cemetery adjoining.

BLAINE.

Plenty of snow and ice.

The protracted meeting at this place is still going on with good success. Eighteen conversions and twenty-two still at the altar.

The Smith Coal Co. had bad luck last week. They got one of their best mules badly crippled.

The mines on the W. Va. side that used to be worked by the Wabash people have again been started up by the Blaine Mining Co. They are working about seven men at this time. We hope they will find good coal. If they do it will be a help to Blaine.

Mrs. Mary Devall has been very sick for the last two weeks.

Mr. Riley Tice goes to Elk Garden every Sunday.

John Greene is now working for the Davis Coal Co. at Oakmont, at the carpenter trade.

The Ancient Order Knights of the Mystic Chain have bought a fine cemetery lot of L. C. Hamill and have built a fine iron fence around it. The cost of the lot and fence is about eight hundred dollars. This order is one of the leading orders of the state. They have only been instituted in Blaine three years and have taken in 150 members and still increase every lodge night.

Ben Simmons is going to put in a saw mill on the Maryland side. He has several large contracts for sawing.

John Thrasher was called to Deer Park last Wednesday to his brother's funeral.

Miss Blanche Miller, one of our school teachers, has been sick for the past week.

HOYES.

Weather continues cold, the temperature dropping to zero Tuesday evening at this place.

Miss Sudie Friend left Hoyes Friday last for Oakland where she spent one night, and went from Oakland Saturday to Keyser, where she will spend about two weeks with her sister, Miss Sadie, and other relatives.

Mr. and Mrs. William Callis were visiting relatives near Hazelton Friday and Saturday last.

Miss Malvy left this place last week for Oakland where she will spend an indefinite time with Mrs. George Giessman.

A number of persons in this community were cutting ice and filling their ice houses Thursday and Friday last.

Mrs. M. Mattingly spent several hours in Accident one evening last week.

Rev. C. H. Hudson of this place, has been conducting protracted services at Thayerville for about two weeks.

Mr. P. R. Savage, of Sang Run, was a guest of W. A. Smith and family last Sunday.

Quite a number of both young and old of this community, attended the protracted services at Elder which closed Monday evening last.

Last Saturday being ground hog day we suppose all had the pleasure of seeing their shadows.

PLEASANT FIELDS OF HOLY WRIT

SAVE for my daily range
Among the pleasant fields of Holy Writ,

The International Sunday School Lesson.

First Quarter. Lesson V. Genesis viii, 1-16. February 3, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

Abram Called to be a Blessing.

Four centuries and a quarter had passed since the Flood. Noah himself had been dead only seventy-five years. Yet the new race seemed as deeply sunken in sin as the old. The goodness and severity of God in the Deluge appeared to have been in vain. In the midnight gloom of a general degeneracy some few tapers, like that of Melchisedec's on Zion, were yet slight; but even these were in danger of extinction by the violence of the wicked.

The race was in revolt against God. It had built its defiant tower, whose lofty stories were to be a refuge in case of a second flood. It seemed to have learned nothing by the sudden judgment which confounded its language and scattered it abroad. The first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans gives a faithful portraiture of the moral condition of the race at this period. Though they knew God, they gloried Him not as God, were thankless, and changed His glory into an image. "With their theoretical errors the stream of their practical transgressions rose to a fearful height." The remains of these eldest cities of the Euphrates Valley, now being dug up, show the people given to those gross immoralities usually attendant upon heathenism. The peril was extreme that the knowledge of God would be entirely lost, and that, too, not by accident, but by design. They did not like (wish or care) to retain God in their knowledge, so the foolish heart of the race was darkened.

At this crisis an ever-watchful Providence stepped in, meeting the emergency in a manner to excite the admiration of men and angels. He let the stream of human life flow on in its perverse course, not arresting it by any further general judgments. But from the great torrent foaming out its shame and casting up its mire and dirt, He took aside a little stream comparatively pure and had it run in a channel He had prepared for it, much as water is taken aside in the race to turn the mill. Here was no capricious favoritism. The design was to bless all humanity by blessing one of its families.

The proverb, "What God does, is well done," has no finer exemplification than in the selection of the progenitor of the new race. His very name is significant,—Abram, "exalted father." Physically, intellectually, spiritually, he was God's man for the hour. His phenomenal virility has survived in his descendants for forty centuries. So has his intellectuality. He was ready for the glorious appearance that approached him. Then, as ever, the prepared message came to the prepared mind.

Abram was the first of pilgrim fathers, the first emigrant impelled by religious motives. He undertook his journey for conscience's sake. He left a lovely land—marvelously rich—the home of the wheat grain, pomegranate, apple and grape. He left the highest civilization of his day and libraries with their tile-page volumes. He left country, kindred, father's house, to become henceforth a pilgrim and a stranger.

Well may his name be engraven high upon that tall obelisk, the eleventh chapter of the Epistle to the Hebrews, among the immortal heroes of faith—for it was with faith that he heard the Divine call, and by faith he obeyed, going out, not knowing whither he went.

It pleased God to encourage and sustain his faith with exceeding great and gracious promise. God undertook to be his guide, promising to show him the land, to make of him a great nation, bless him and make him a blessing; to make His cause his own, so that his friends should be God's friends, his enemies God's enemies. He should be the first link in that long chain of generations of which, in the fullness of time, the Messiah would be born.

Three verses suffice to describe the call; the fourth narrates the obedience. So Abram departed. A blessed adventurer, he voyaged across the sea of sand upon his ship of the desert. As Columbus landed upon the shore of the new world unfurled the standard of Spain, and took possession of it in the name of his kingly patron, so Abram, reaching at length the land of promise, built an altar and dedicated the land and its inhabitants to Jehovah.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The genesis of anything always has a peculiar fascination. We never tire of origins. This lesson brings us to the fountain-head of the most important racial stream that has ever coursed its way through history; a stream to whose bosom the oracles of God were committed for twenty centuries; a stream that bore to earth the infant Messiah, as His type once floated on the Nile. A bird's-eye view of the winding of this stream, and the possible important function it may perform in the future of the kingdom of God, will prove an attractive introduction to the lesson.

Effort should be made to portray Abraham's exalted character and his fitness for the purpose for which God employed him. Crowd his career into a nutshell. Display magnanimity, etc.; admit its blemishes, but show them mere spots on the sun. Abraham would be a good man for our age; he was superlatively good for the age in which he lived. The Bible deals faithfully with the characters it portrays. It presents its characters, not ideally, but as they actually were.

* * * * *

Legends concerning Abraham may be used with good effect—especially the one from the Koran which describes him as secretly nourished in a cave until he grew up. Coming to the mouth of the cave for the first time, he sees a star and cries, "This is my god." But the star fades before the moon, and he acknowledges the latter as his god. But when the sun rose he turned in adoration to it, until it in turn sank—then the patriarch cried: "Neither star, nor moon, nor sun shall be my god, but He who made the heavens and the earth!" By whatever process, Abraham had shaken off the polytheism and idolatry of his fathers, and was monotheistic and Messiah-aspiring.

* * * * *

Through this fascinating narrative, as through a tissue curtain, one sees the Christian life spiritually portrayed. The Christian is a called one. He has heard and heeded. He breaks away from an old environment. He makes a transition. The word Hebrew first applied to Abram (Genesis xiv, 13) is supposed to mean "one who has crossed over," and to refer to the passage of the Euphrates. The Christian starts for a better land, assuring his heart with the faithfulness of the Promiser. He sings.

"I'm but a stranger here—Heaven's my home."

He shows by his manner of life that he regards himself as a pilgrim. He might go back to his old life if he wanted to—as Abraham might have gone back to Mesopotamia, but he did not. He rears his altars as he journeys on. As Matthew Henry says: "Wherever Abraham had a tent, there God had an altar." He is God's witness as he goes; observed of all observers, his light and salt the savor of all about him. He ha but one river to cross, and that is Jordan—and then he enters the sweet fields of Canaan.

* * * * *

It paid Abraham well, and that for two worlds to obey God. Present-day obedience to God has promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come.

* * * * *

A lasting and good fame is the gift of God. "I will make thy name great."

* * * * *

Terah is the type of those who fall out by the way in the march to the land of promise. Robert Collyer says: "Terah started for the highlands of Canaan, but he settled on a flat."

BLOOMINGTON.

Richard Gladfelty, enroute home to Saulsburg, Pa., from Hendricks, where he was called to see his sick brother, stopped off for a few days at Barnum to visit his son, Grover Cleveland Gladfelty.

Mrs. Bessie Burleigh, of Washington, D. C., is visiting her parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Wolf.

Miss Clara Tibbets is home after a very pleasant visit to relatives at Connellsville, Pa.

Prof. Richardson and wife, of Piedmont, were the guests on Sunday of Mr. and Mrs. Russell Kight, of Baruum.

The annual big meeting or revival services of the M. E. church, under the charge of the pastor, Rev. Snedegar, commenced on last Monday evening.

The stork is still making his pleasant and agreeable visits to this vicinity. On last Monday he left a bundle of pink and white with Mr. and Mrs. Arch Kelley, of Franklin, and another at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Everett Notts, on Nob Hill. Both were boys.

The wreck train wrecked—the riggers train from Cumberland bound east, after clearing up a wreck near Schell, was derailed on last Tuesday morning, one mile east of Blaine. The rear car, used by the men as a camp car, fitted up with cooking stoves, bunks, ect., jumped the track and rolled down the embankment 40 feet to the bank of the river. Ten men were in the car at the time of the accident and all escaped serious injury. Trainmaster Mickey, of the junction, fared the worse, he was caught under a pile of loose lumber, when the car went over and was unable to extricate himself until rescued by fellow trainmen. He was painfully crushed about the back, hips and limbs, but is able to attend to his duties. Supervisor John Niland was in the car and was thrown through a window, escaped with out injury. The train was running at about 18 miles an hour. The accident was due to a defective rail.

This is the kind of weather the "ole hoss" gets away with the automobile.

"Funny Jim" of "breakfast food" fame tells of the future of John Raley, of this place, and Hugh Tate, of Cumberland—both of these popular players will be with Sioux City next season.

The latest matrimonial news at Barnum is the announcement of the marriage of Mr. Richard Grant and Miss Eva Burke, at the home of the bride, on next Sunday afternoon.

John Harman, aged 75 years, died at his home near Barnum, on last Sunday morning, January 20. He came to this county from Germany when he was forty years old and was a well known resident of this end of Garrett county. He left a wife and ten children, five sons and five daughters: Mesdames Henry Stridings, Silas Platter, William Virts, Jackson Paugh and George Tichnell, the boys were Joseph, John, Webster, George and Charles. His remains were interred in the Turner grave yard on Tuesday morning following his death.

SAID TO HAVE HAPPENED IN MARION COUNTY.

Silver Tongued Orator Said He Hailed From Wetzel.

Wetzel county, W. Va., isn't very far from any place in particular, as to distance, but in many respects it is pretty remote. Its denizens, like all mountain and highland folk, are strong on liberty of speech and freedom of action. "Montani semper Liber." "Facillis descensus averni"—which by interpretation means "It is always easy to slide into hell from Montana or Liberia, but not from West Virginia."

The one particularly gallant defender of the clan, and stander-up for his native crags and peaks is, "The Tall Wahoo of Wetzel," Oliver Galleher,—or Gallahue, according to local nomeclature. "Ol. Gallahue"—by that token is he known throughout the length and breadth and heighth of Wetzel.

He is built somewhat on the specifications of Abraham Lincoln. That is, vertically speaking. He would be about neck and neck with that gentleman in length, but nowhere near him in embonpoint of pulchritude.

He is about 35 or 40, as years go, but age has nothing to do with it. As he himself says, he is "as old as all the sages of the ages, and as young as a chortling cherub laved in the Fountain of Perpetual Youth."

He owns a hillside farm up on Fishing creek, but that doesn't bother him much. He also owns a lot of dogs and guns and is fond of hunting, so long as he doesn't find things and have to shoot them. But his hobby, sport and pastime is the law. And he is always ready and willing to argue any kind of a case in the local justice shops. And speechmaking—well, name your subject—anything—and Ol. is there, full of sublime thoughts of his own and everybody elses; gets off with a flying start and romps twice around the ring to anybody else's once. As "Devil John" Wiley says, "Ol. kin wrop his tongue aroun' more words to the minute, an' eject 'em faster'n any chap 'at ever come over the knob." He is untutored, as far as schools are concerned, but has tutored himself to such purpose that he has the best things of the master minds pretty well corralled.

Talking about schooling brings us around to the time several years ago when he matriculated at the Fairmont Normal school—and that's what I started in to tell about.

He lasted just three weeks there, rest of the school and town.

Soon after he had descended on that classic town and made it all his own, a "Tom Show" (Uncle Tom's Cabin) opened for a two night stand at the Opera House. Several of the hot-boy students and staving young blades of the burg had started in at first to string out Mr. Gallahue, just because he was from Wetzel and looked like a fresh and easy one, but they very soon found that they had guessed it wrong, for he was always there eleven to their one. So they had cottoned up to him and proceded to sic him onto the unsuspecting, and then give the haw-haw when the latter got stung. So they proposed to Ol. that they all take in the show, saying that they had the tickets for the first row. They had bought one ticket for that row, and booked themselves far in the rear.

It was a stormy night, and Ol. showed up in a long wet rubber coat, high top boots, and hat with a foot wide brim. They had stopped along the way for several sundries and things and entered the theater just at the time Topsy was handing out a well deserved bit of repartee to Mr. Marks, the attorney-at-law. The boys jiggied Ol. to the front of the procession and fell back to their places, whilst he, accoutred as he was, strode on after the usher to his place right down by the fiddlers. The burst of applause which the mimic show had just then elicited, was immediately recommenced, aided and abetted, augmented and aggravated by the enthusiastic friends of this spectacular entry. Most of the audience knew him or thought they did, and at once caught on and likewise transfered their attention to the hero of Wetzel and by the time he had shed his long coat and threw it into his seat with his big hat on top of it, and glared around in search of his followers who hadn't followed he found himself the recipient of an ovation that was a combination of a Chautauqua salute and a German student's hilee-hilo.

Did he rise to the occasion? He did. And that show stopped right there; nor would the audience permit it to proceed till their man had finished.

With a low sweeping and far-reaching bow he sailed in:

"Ladies and gentlemen, fellow citizens and fools, I thank you for your very vociferous applause and for your most cordial reception, which, to me, is as unexpected as it is flattering.

"If asked from where I hail from, my sole reply shall be, I hail not from Appomattox and its famous apple tree where the conquering hero wrestled the sword of victory from the vanquished foe. Nor did I with the embattled farmers stand and fire the shot heard round the world; nor with Napoleon, cross the bridge at Lodi and mingle the Eagles of France with the Eagles of the crags, whilst forty centuries were looking down upon us. I hail not from storied lands across the seas haloed by painter's brush and moving tales of daring to do when gallant knights rode forth with waving plume and flashing crest to fight for ladies fair, or with lance in rest entered the lists to pluck the bubble of reputation from the cannon's mouth.

"I hail not from lands of palm and southern pine where close by the cottage door the sweet magnolia blooms, while through the dusky wildwood there throbs the mockbird's song, where the balmy jasmine-scented zephyrs gently waft across the perfumed fields, and wake to ecstacy the living lyre.

"Nor yet from the bleak New England shores, where the breaking waves dashed high on a stern and rock bound coast, while the sternfaced fathers anchored safe the immortal bark, smoothed off the face of Plymouth Rock, and carved the Ten Commandments upon that everlasting cornerstone of this eternal tower of Liberty which lifts its shining turrets to the star-spangled azure dome of the blue imperial heavens.

"Not from the vine-clad hills of La Belle France, nor storied castles on the Rhine, nor down among the English lanes where shepherds watch their flocks by night, nor from heather clad hills of the Land o' Cakes where the Scottish chiefs, with claymore in one hand and pibroch in the other, charged down across the Culloden Moor and scoured these English hence across the Banks and Braes o' Bonny Doon.

"Nor did I spring like Phoenix from its ashes, or Minerva from the head of Jove, or Aphrodite from the ocean's wave—from dream of mystic poet, or vision of philosophic seer.

"But—I do spring from the grand old county of Wetzel, where the soil is so fertile and so salubrious the clime, that her teeming harvests leave no space for the upspringing of that noxious weed, Ignorance, (which I perceive, flourishes hereabouts in great luxuriance.)

"I hail from the cloud-kissed hills of Wetzel, whose snow-capped peaks lift up their shining fronts to greet the god of day whilst yet ye sluggards of the lowland sleep, reclined on couches of inglorious ease.

"I hail from Wetzel, beneath whose towering hills and babbling brooks and bosky-dells there lies a mineral and an oleaginous wealth that puts to shame the mines of Ophir or the Isles of Ind.

"Wetzel, from whose rugged slopes her sturdy sons fared forth duty's call to imbrue their arms in internecine and fraternal strife what time the dogs of war were loosed, and then fared back again to reassume the arts of peace and make of this the Kingpin county of the Warborn State.

"Glorious old Wetzel! whose sons are brave and daughters fair, and which today produces gas enough to light the world, oil enough to lubricate it and brain enough to rule it."

(Prolonged and uncontrollable applause.)

Next morning the principal had Oliver "on the carpet" and said, "Mr. Galleher, I have been informed of your performance of last evening. What explanation have you to offer for such conduct?"

"Well," said Ol, "the way things were going I felt like it was up to me to let 'em know that old Wetzel was able to sit up an' bark, and maybe I did make these Marion-ettes dance a little lively. All I said was like this——"

Then he cut in and reeled off the whole speech just as he had delivered it the night before. When he had finished his auditor said:

"Well, I'll overlook it this time, but see here, Mr. Galleher, the next time you intend to do anything like that, just let me know in advance, will you, so I can buy a ticket."—R. C. Curry, in Parkersburg Dispatch-News.

Dont write him anything by hand that takes him time to make out—that may leave him in doubt—that he can't easily read.
And don't fill out legal papers or card memos—or make out accounts of hotel menus in your own handwriting.
It looks bad, reflects on your standing, makes people think you can't afford a stenographer, and is sometimes ambiguous.
You can write out your letters—make out an abstract—fill in an insurance policy—enter your card memos—make out your accounts, or a hotel menu—or do any kind of writing you need, on any kind, size or thickness of paper, and space any way you want on
The OLIVER Typewriter
The Standard Visible Writer.
You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work is be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

At the local institute held at Oakland last week the teachers thanked the newspapers of the town for their liberality in giving so much space to educational subjects. It is hoped that all of the teachers of the county appreciate their cooperation with the educators of the county, and it is hoped that the teachers in return will help the papers by subscribing and by sending in to the press articles written about local events, such as will be of general interest to the people of the county.

The following articles have been received for publication in the series:

ON TEACHING HISTORY.

The following article sets forth a method of teaching history which I think can be successfully employed by those who consider it worthy of a trial.

At the commencement of the study of history require each student to draw an outline map of North America. This should contain only the physical features; namely, coast line, mountains, lakes and rivers. As the pupils proceed from text to text, let them mark on the map the places discovered, the settlements, the battles, the annexations, et cetera, with their dates. They will thus see the country grow afresh under their eye, and history and geography will be indissollubly linked. This will tend to impress upon the mind of the pupil the facts so extensively that merely glancing at their maps will recall the history that surround such facts.

I do not advocate the memorizing of dates to any great extent; of course, some of the most important should be memorized, but I do not think it appropriate to commit all the dates since it has a tendency to confuse the pupil more than to enlighten him.

In teaching history the teacher should keep in mind two designs, namely: to cause the pupil to become familiar with those important events in our history which every American citizen should know, and to present it in snch a way as to arouse the pupil's interest, inspire enthusiasm for the study, and to create a patriotic feeling for his or her country. In carrying out this design the teacher should avoid all sectional and partisan statements; to present from the standpoint of the Union, those principals, which coming to an issue at different times, have been decided by the progress of events; and incidentally try to inspire a love for our country, and an earnest and intelligent solicitude for her destiny. To accomplish this the teacher should furnish copious notes containing collateral facts coalescent with the event, such as minor occurances, sketches of the lives of presidents and great and noted men, and especially those anecdotes of heroism and devotion that so brighten the record of our national growth.

The pupils' patriotism must be kindled when they come to see how slowly, yet how gloriously, this tree of liberty has grown, what storms have wrenched its boughs, what sweat of toil and blood have moistened its roots, what eager eyes have watched its every outspringing bud, and what brave hearts have defended it, loving it even unto death. A heritage thus sanctioned by the by the heroism and devotion of the fathers cannot but elicit the choicest care and tenderest devotion of the sons.

The great battles may be made easy of rememberence by associating with each the pivotal points on which its issue turned; and by introducing something of the philosophy of history by stating the plan of each campaign, and the object sought by, and the results of the important engagements, thus leading the pupil to appreciate the fact that events hinge upon each other.

Flagging interest may be stimulated by narrating a curious circumstance, a noble sentiment, or a deed of heroism, in some way connected with the event, and fix the fact more permanently in the mind. For example, the inauguration of Van Buren will take on a new meaning when the pupil is told that Van Buren with General Jackson at his side rode to the capitol in a carriage made of wood from the ship Constitution, and as they passed, the crowd shared its cheers between "Old Hickory" and "Old Ironsides."

After all has been said, the fact remains that the chief end to be accomplished in teaching history is to instill within the minds of the rising generation a heroic and patriotic devotion to their native land, so that when they are called upon to fill the place of some senior companion they may be able to fill the proffered place with alacrity and with ability which will always make our country safe from the enemies both within and without our land.

WHO IS THE BACKBONE OF THE SCHOOL?

Last week, under the above heading, it was pointed out that the teacher should not be expected to be the principal person back of the school. It was then said that this week an attempt would be made to prove that the trustees should not be counted upon as the only people upon whom the success of the school depended.

When we consider this school official, then do we truly find a man who works for nothing for the schools. In too many instances, however, throughout Garrett county, is it true that even the laboring-for-nothing trustee is not worthy of his hire. The interest of many of our trustees is exceedingly lax; too many of them have no concern in the schools at all. It is for this reason, largely, that the schools of this county are as backward as they are when compared to the other schools of this State. Many of our trustees are themselves uneducated, and therefore are unable to appreciate the blessings of the public schools; it is well known that people who are educated will do all possible to get others also instructed. Many of our trustees do not seem to realize that the stability of our free institutions depends upon education; for too often ignorance breeds viciousness and viciousness is no respecter of law and order or of any institution whatsoever.

Some trustees for instance never visit their schools. If they only knew what a source of inspiration their visits are to the schools and to the children therein, they would make a sacrifice to spend a few hours at least once a year in the school room as a keen and interested participant. The trustee, unless he be a parent, who has children in the school, has practically no interest in the school at all. Why should they? They have enough troubles as it is without taking up those extra burdens of the school.

However, there are some trustees in this county who measure well up to their duties and discharge their obligations with great credit to themselves and to the school over which they officiate. These successful trustees visit the school at least once or twice a year; they consult the teacher occasionally about the work being done; and they make an effort to help the teacher to have the reports signed each month. These are three little things, it is true. But they distinguish the successful trustee from the one who is unworthy of the position which he occupies in the school system. If the trustee can not do these little things, he should move out and make room for one who will. It is the trustees who can exert a great influence for making the schools better; and by taking an active part in their management, by standing by the teacher they employed, the trustees can do much towards helping the cause of education and this county. These are all little things which the trustee is asked to do. However, as it is proverbially said, "Trifles make perfection, but perfection is no trifle."

Last week we saw that the interest of the teacher of the school is for the day, and that of the trustee who does his fullest duty is exceedingly small towards making the school what it should be in order to do the greatest possible amount of good. In the next article an attempt will be made to point out upon whom does rest the duty of making the schools better, and who should be looked upon as the ones who should be the backbone of the school.

LETTER FROM INDIA.

Miss Blanche Davis Writing From That Faraway Country.

The subjoined letter was received several days ago by Rev. W. S. Davis from his daughter Miss Blanche, who is touring India in company with Rev. Dr. Stone, of New York, and is given space in these columns:

When we got here in Bareilly we found lots of mail from home for every one of us. I don't believe I could have enjoyed any Christmas presents more than I did those letters from you all. To tell the truth I've been a little homesick ever since but I like to be that way if it's caused by letters.

I had quite a nice time on Christmas. Hung up my stocking as usual, and it was filled. I think Mrs. Price with whom we stayed in Calcutta did the Santa Claus act.

Nothing more of importance happened that day except the dinner given us by Miss Moxley, a deaconess. While in Calcutta a Mr. and Mrs. Smith, old friends of Uncle Sumner, showed us quite a good time. They are English people and really are about the nicest English ones I've seen yet. They are generally so snobbish. The Saturday before Christmas they had a yachting party for us and took us down the Hooglie river to the famous botanical gardens where that wonderful Banyan tree is. It certainly is wonderful. Five hundred feet in circumference and it has hundreds of stalks. The other things orchids, houses, etc., are beautiful but the tree is the attraction. On Monday morning they took us in their victoria all over the zoological gardens. They are perfectly wonderful too. They beat Highland Zoo, but at that time I should have enjoyed being there.

That same morning Uncle Sumner took us to Kali-ghat. You know that is the place where they sacrificed human beings to Kali. It's the dirtiest, vilest, bloodiest temple I was ever in. They still sacrifice kids or bullocks every day. That is where all the fakirs, beggars, lepers and other miserable people gather and I never hoped to see such awful pieces of humanity. Talk about the beauty of the Hindoo religion!

On Christmas night after the usual rush of departure, we left for Bareilly via Benares and Lucknow. We spent all of Wednesday in Benares. The first thing we saw was a monkey temple. It is an old tumble-down affair, just alive with monkeys,—all sorts and sights and conditions; in all the dirt and filth which could be endured, even by monkeys.

From there we went to the bathing ghats on the Ganges. There we saw all kinds of people bathing in and worshiping the river. We got on a little barge and were rowed up and down the river to get a general view of the different ghats, temples, etc. The temples along the river are beautiful in some respects, but are greatly out of repair and many are half sunken in the water. The burning ghat where all dead bodies are cremated, is another "beautiful" sight. I thought I saw a body in one of the fires, but as none of the rest saw it, Aunt Kate said it was imagination and I suspect it was. You know they make a sort of altar and cover the body with wood, so that it is almost impossible to see it. There are many fires always burning.

From the ghats we went to the Cow temple which is headquarters for the worship of the sacred bulls. We saw many hundreds of people worshiping different cows, feeding them with rice and decorating them with sacred flowers. It was another dirty place.

The nicest place we saw that day was the birth place of Buddha. It is the ruin of a great temple said to have been erected six centuries B. C. Some of the old carvings are beautiful and wonderful, considering their age. It is about six miles from town and the drive is delightful.

That night we left for Lucknow and we arrived in the morning. We went up and had luncheon at the Isabella Thoburn College. Before leaving Uncle Sumner Stone took us over to the British Residency which was ruined during the rebellion of the Sepoys in 1857.

I'm glad to hear that Bess is so nicely settled, and so pleased with her work. She has been great in writing so frequently to me.

I'm afraid this letter's more like a diary than a nice homey letter, but really sight-seeing is the only thing of interest to tell about.

Lots of love to everyone,

BLANCHE.

Bareilly, India, December 29, 1906.

Notice of Condemnation Proceedings.

No. 136 Miscellaneous Docket. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The County Commissioners of Garrett County v. Joseph M. Crim, Edward Crim and Mattie Crim his wife, Calvin Crim and Clara Crim his wife, William Crim and Annie Crim his wife, George Crim and Nellie Crim his wife, Ida Crim and E. J. Crim her husband, Minnie Menhorn and John Menhorn her husband, Fannie Nogle and Daniel Nogle her husband, Elizabeth Crim, William R. Offutt and J. C. Renninger, Trustees; George D. white and Alfred G. Sturgiss.

To Edward Crim and Mattie Crim his wife, Calvin Crim and Clara Crim his wife, William Crim and Annie Crim his wife, George Crim and Nellie Crim his wife, Ida Crim and E. J. Crim her husband, Fannie Nogle and Daniel Nogle her husband, and Elizabeth Crim, owners of Lot No. 44 in the town of Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland, and hereinafter particularly described.

You are hereby notified that the County Commissioners for Garrett County have applied to the Honorable Robert R. Henderson, one of the Judges for the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland, for a warrant to be directed to the Sheriff of said Garrett County requiring him to summon a jury to condemn the property hereinafter mentioned and described, and that in accordance with said application the said warrant was on the fourth day of February, 1907, directed to the said Sheriff as will fully appear in said proceedings the same being No. 136 Miscellaneous in the Circuit Caurt for Garrett County; and you are hereby notified that on the twenty third day of February 1907, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. an inquisition will be held on the land and premises hereinafter particularly described in the town of Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland, at the suit of the County Commissioners for Garrett County against you and others to condemn a certain piece or parcel of ground and the improvements and material thereon as is necessary for the use and occupation in perpetuity of said County Commissioners for the following public purposes, to-wit: for the erection thereon of a new court house building for Garrett County, for grounds for the same, and for the use of conveying the prisoners from the County jail over and through said lot to the said court house, and for the purpose of running steam, water and sewerage pipes through said lot from the said proposed court house to the said jail for the purposes thereof: and for sufficient grounds and way from said court house to said jail for a walk to said jail way, and for other necessary purposes set forth in said petition; and that upon said inquisition at said time and place a jury of said county summoned by the Sheriff of said county will find whether or not the condemnation of such land, buildings or materials is necessary and proper for the use of said county for the due exercise and enjoyment of its corporate privileges as hereinbefore set forth; and will justly and impartially value the damages which you and the other owners will sustain by reason of the use and occupancy of said land, buildings and materials, in perpetuity. The said County Commissioners having been unable to agree with Joseph M. Crim, one of the said owners, upon the purchase price of said property, and that you are nonresidents of Garrett county, Md., in which said land so wanted lies.

Said land so wanted and to be condemned is described as follows, to-wit: Being all that lot of ground in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, and known and designated as Lot No. 44 in said town as shown on the plat filed by McCarty and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 2, folio 513, one of the Land Records of said Garrett county, Maryland, beginning for the same at the first line of Lot No. 40 on said plat, and running thence South 67 degrees East 5 perches, North 23 degrees East 8 perches, North 67 degrees West 5 perches, and then by a straight line to the beginning, containing ¼ of an acre more or less. This being the same property described in a deed from John M. Davis et al., Trustees, to Mary Jane Crim dated the 5th day of May, 1877, and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 3, folio 223, &c, one of the Land Records of Garrett county, Maryland.

That the said lot is necessary and proper to be condemned for the use of said county for the public purposes as aforesaid, and is necessary and proper as well as each and every part of said lot for the use of said court house, jail, grounds and the purposes aforesaid.

You are therefore notified that said inquisition will be held at the aforesaid time and place for the purposes aforesaid and to be present if you see fit, in person or by attorney, and to take such action in the premises as you may be advised or may see proper.

PETER J. STEPHENS,
A. CLYDE SMITH,
ASA B. FRIEND,
The County Commissioners of Garrett County, Maryland.

Attest: A. G. Ross, Clerk.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44-5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

An Argument.

"How silly!" exclaimed the daughter of the plutocrat. "The idea of my marrying you, who have absolutely nothing, even though I do like you immensely! Why, I spend $100,000 a year on dresses alone. Goodness only knows how much money I actually waste."

"Yes," argued the earnest youth, "I had thought of that. The way I figure it, you throw away enough money right along to support a husband in good style."—Judge.

NEW TRIAL DENIED PLATT SENTENCED TO TWO YEARS

Man Found Guilty of Burning Saw Mill Given Minimum Sentence.

Charles Platt, who was found guilty at the December Term of the Circuit Court of having burned the McMillan saw mill over in District No. 8, received his sentence on last Friday afternoon, Judge Henderson, of Cumberland, pronouncing it.

Platt, who is a Hebrew, at the time the mill was burned, was in the employ of the McMillan Company in the capacity of night watchman, and testified at his trial that when the fire originated he was at some distance from the mill in quest of his horse, which had broken its halter and strayed away. Instead of returning to the mill he went on to Bayard, which is located a mile or more away and gave the alarm, but before the residents of that town arrived at the fire it had consumed the mill. An investigation was set on foot by the State's officers who discovered that the lumber yard adjoining the mill had also been fired but the lumber being recently cut it did not burn, in spite of the fact that kerosene oil in large quantities had been thrown over the timber. Suspicion pointed to Platt as the guilty party and he was arrested at Bayard, which is on the West Virginia side of the river, by an officer of that State, who turned him over to Sheriff Lee, of this county.

At the time of the fire insurance to the amount of over $30,000 was in force on the mill and manufactured lumber, $6,000 being on the mill and the balance on the lumber. After the fire the owners of the plant liquidated by going into bankruptcy when the lumber was sold for about $13,000 by the trustees appointed by the Conrt.

Platt was tried on the charge of having burned the mill, Judge Henderson sitting as judge and jury. Immediately upon being found guilty of the crime Platt's attorneys made a motion for a retrial of the case which was argued before Judge Henderson on the 2nd inst., who on Friday last rendered his decision denying a retrial.

Prior to passing sentence upon Platt Judge Henderson asked him if he had anything to say when the prisoner made quite a speech, denying his guilt in a most vehement manner and stating that he had been made a tool of by other parties. Judge Henderson then reviewed the case and told Platt that he would give him the minimum sentence prescribed by law, which is two years in the penitentiary, to which institution Sheriff Lee conducted the prisoner Sunday night, the officer returning to Oakland Tuesday morning.

AGED CITIZEN FOUND DEAD IN HIS YARD

Lewis Lish, Aged 71 Years, Succumbed Tuesday and His Body Discovered.

Tuesday evening the lifeless body of Lewis Lish, who resided on his thirty-five acre farm over in District No. 8, was found lying in the yard surrounding his home by Mr. James Moreland, a nephew of the dead man, the cause of Mr. Lish's death being due to asthma, with which he had been suffering four weeks or more.

The deceased was a bachelor and was aged about seventy-one years. He had been living alone for a long number of years and while ill was attended by his nephew, who lives near the home of Mr. Lish. Mr. Moreland's last visit to the Lish house was Tuesday morning, when he fed the stock and did the chores, returning to his own home about noon. The same evening Mr. Moreland again went over to his uncle's and discovered his dead body lying in the yard as above stated.

The remains, after an examination had been made by a physician who had been summoned, were conveyed to the home of Mr. Moreland from where the funeral will occur this afternoon at two o'clock.

School Board Meeting.

The Garrett County School Board considered the question of creating a high school at Friendsville was discussed, but definite action was deferred until next meeting.

The use of the school building for the purpose of holding normal at Oakland was granted to Prof. M. K. Turner and at Friendsville to Prof. J. C. Beahm. It was decided to open a normal either at Grantsville or Bittinger, but no application being filed for the use of the school house at either point, the matter was laid over until the next meeting.

MEETING FOR THE MEN WAS LARGELY ATTENDED

Two Excellent Addresses Made by Dr. W. W. Davis and Mr. S. T. Jones

Probably the most interesting religious meeting held in Oakland for many years was that of last Sunday afternoon in St. Paul's M. E. church, when the auditorium was almost entirely filled with the male residents of Oakland and vicinity, who came in response to an invitation extended through the press and by personal solicitation to hear an address by Rev. Dr. William Watters Davis, of Mountain Lake Park.

The meeting was called for half after three o'clock but long before the time came the church was comfortably filled. The tedium of waiting for the opening hour was bridged by singing a number of hymns, Dr. Robinson presiding at the organ and Prof. Morris K. Turner leading the singing who was heartily joined by nearly every one present.

Mr. Scott T. Jones, after a prayer offered by Presiding Elder Dr. R. B. Ward, made a spirited address to the congregation in which he made plain the duty men owe themselves, their country, their families and their Maker to lead upright Christian lives, illustrating his remarks by referring to many of the Biblical characters whose lives, though seemingly pure, we are not to follow as examples, for Abraham was deceitful in palming off his wife as being his sister; Jacob stole his brother's birthright and David was guilty of a most heinous crime, but rather follow the example of that Most Righteous One.

Following Mr. Jones' remarks Prof. Turner sang a beautiful solo.

Dr. Davis' remarks upon the subject, "Wanted—A Man, were a revelation to his auditors. The speaker showed the necessity of a man living the life of a Christian, with what ease the path way of rectitude may followed by the manly man who was inclined to do so. Clinching his arguments which pointed facts which come under the eye of the observing individual almost daily. His remarks occupied an hour in their delivery and every moment of the time he held the undivided attention of his auditors, many of them being deeply affected by the words of the speaker and expressed a determination to lead better and nobler lives in the future.

THE MARYLAND SENATORS.

State Contingent All Agog Over The Coming Fight Here.

The Maryland contingent is getting all agog over the big fight opening in their State for the Senatorship. Preparations are being made by the managers of both parties for a close and determined contest. The new Legislature will be elected next November and will assemble early in January. It will have the double duty of electing someone to fill the unexpired term of the late Arthur Pue Gorman and of electing a Senator for the full term beginning in March, 1909. The veteran William Pinkney Whyte has announced his determination to keep out of the fight, and will step aside as soon as the Legislature assembles.

If the Democrats control the Legislature the fight for the toga will be between Governor Warfield and Representative J. Fred C. Talbott, of Baltimore county. Mr. Talbott is skilled in the Gorman school of politics, and was one of Mr. Gorman's most trusted lieutenants for years. He is now generally regarded as the successor of Gorman in the old organization which was controlled for so long a time by Maryland's great Senator. He has been designated by Chairman Taggart to take Mr. Gorman's place on the Democratic national committee.

If the Republicans carry the Legislature the contest will be between Attorney General Bonaparte and Representative Mudd—"Marse Sydney." It is well understood that the national Administration will be favorable to Mr. Bonaparte, and thus, so far as the Republicans are concerned, the Maryland Senatorial contest will be invested with a national political character. Should President Roosevelt's Attorney General win the Senatorship, Mr. Bonaparte would doubtless control the delegation to the Republican national convention.—Washington Herald.

APPLICATION FOR SEWAGE FRANCHISE WITHDRAWN

Council Failed to Act On Measure Presented and It Is Recalled.

The Town Council, which held an adjourned meeting last Thursday night to consider the application of Mr. A. D. Naylor, representing himself and other citizens and taxpayers of Oakland, for a franchise to erect a system of sewage for the town, failed to reach an agreement concerning the measuce after a spirited meeting, which was called for this evening.

When the Council failed to take definite action on the application it was withdrawn by Mr. Naylor, consequently the meeting this evening will be of no effect.

While considerable opposition was manifested against the granting of the franchise to Mr. Naylor by two or three members of the Council and one or two residents of the town they had nothing better to offer, as a substitute measure and consequently the delay in installing a system of sewage will be again delayed, probably for years to come.

While the Council no doubt acted conscientiously in thus delaying final action until after more thorough investigation into the merits of the measure, it would appear that private citizens who opposed the granting of the franchise did so from a selfish standpoint and not for the public weal.

HOYES.

As we have not heretofore mentioned the progress of our school this winter we will now say Miss Bernadette Mattingly has taught a very successful school so far, and we hope it will continue so until the close of school.

The infant daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ode DeWitt's was suddenly taken ill a few days ago with scarlet fever. We hope for its recovery soon.

Quite a number of the young folks of this community gave Mr. Ralph Brenneman an agreeable surprise party last Saturday evening. All had a very enjoyable time.

Mr. Alvin Lowdermilk, principal of the Mt. Lake school, spent last Saturday and Sunday with his parents at this place, and returned to Mt. Lake Sunday evening.

Miss Blanche Callis, accompanied by her brother Charles spent Sunday with their sister Miss Dessie, at Glen Dale.

Mr. Gilbert Enlow accompanied by his best girl was out taking advantage of the good sleighing snow last Sunday afternoon.

Mr. Fred Miller was a very pleasant visitor at our school Monday morning.

Miss Auburn Smith was a guest of Miss Jessie Lowdermilk Sunday.

Rev. C. W. Hudson was was holding services at Loch Lynn was hastily summoned home last Monday on account of the illness of his little daughter, who was suffering from a severe attack of croup.

In the absence of the pastor Rev. H. E. Friend conducted services at the Methodist church Sunday morning.

Among some of the number of young people sleigh riding Sunday evening were Mr. Arthur DeWitt and Miss Olia Mattingly, Mr. Norris Welch and Miss Artie Friend and Mr. Burns Lowdermilk and Hazel Poland.

As the skating is fine at the Custer lake, the young people are making good use of it. Misses Bernadette Mattingly, Bertha Custer, Auburn Smith, and Messrs. Burns and Harry Lowdermilk, Norris Welch, Arthur DeWitt and Arthur Custer all spent several hours Tuesday evening on the ice.

Miss Sadie DeWitt left this place last week to visit her sister Mrs. Maud Brenneman near Crellin, for a few weeks, but while there her little niece contracted scarlet fever and she is now compelled to prolong her visit for an indefinite time.

COVE.

A few items if you see fit to use them in your paper.

Mrs. Smearman is on the sick list.

FOR BEST CROP OF POTATOES RAISED ON ONE-FOURTH ACRE

A Prize of $10 Offered Through The Republican to Farmers.

A gentleman, who is a non-resident of Garrett county and who desires his name withheld in connection with the matter, has sent THE REPUBLICAN a check for $10 to be offered as a prize for the best quarter acre of potatoes raised in Garrett county this year.

The gentleman making this offer stipulates in his letter to the editor that the measurement of the land and product is to be made by a committee appointed by Mr. Sincell, of THE REPUBLICAN, or some other person selected by him. The contestants are to enter before planting time and are to furnish THE REPUBLICAN at the end of the season with a detailed statement of the kind of land used, how planted and cultivated and any other information that can be used to benefit other farmers, and to give an intelligent idea of what Garrett county farm land can produce under proper cultivation.

The premium of ten dollars should act as an incentive to our farmer friends to try their hand in raising this important product. Farmers in all parts of the county may enter this contest.

Resolutions of Respect.

We, the committee appointed to draft resolutions of respect upon the death of Wm. Thrasher, a brother Red Man and a member of Youghiogheny Tribe No. 151, of Mt. Lake Park, Md., submit the following:

WHEREAS, It has pleased the Great Spirit in his love and wisdom to take to Himself from the hunting grounds of this earth to those above Bro. Wm. Thrasher who was loved and esteemed by all, therefore be it

Resolved, That deeply conscious of our loss, we submit ourselves to the will of the Great Spirit whose dealings, though sometimes strange, are for the good of them that love Him.

Resolved, That we extend to Mrs. Thrasher and family our deepest sympathy in this their time of sorrow; that we drape our charter for 60 days, that these resolutions be recorded in our minutes, a copy be sent to Mrs. Thrasher and family and that we request each of the county papers to publish them.

H. E. MAY,
C. M. CALHOUN,
J. D. HAYDEN,
Committee.

Church Social.

In St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church next Wednesday evening, the 20th inst., at 7.30 o'clock, a social will be held, the object being to organize a Young People's Society.

New Church Bell Has Arrived.

The bell for St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church arrived on Monday and is yet at the station. As soon as the weather permits the bell will be raised to the belfry and will be used probably for the Sunday services.

REVIVAL MEETING STILL GROWING IN INTEREST

Saint Paul's M. E. Church In Oakland Doing a Splendid Work.

The revival now in progress in Saint Paul's Methodist Episcopal church in Oakland is growing more interesting and is being strengthened by the Spirit at every succeeding meeting.

The meeting is making impressions upon the minds of every one in the town and is being discussed in business places, shops and stores to the exclusion of nearly every other subject.

Tuesday night was the banner night so far in point of the number converted and the manifestation of the power of prayer, when five persons professed conversion.

These meetings have been of peculiar tenderness; scores of persons have been quietly moved to tears, and while the noisy demonstrations that sometimes characterize assemblages of this character have been absent, yet almost everyone who attends feels the spirit of the meetings and go away with new resolutions formed and strengthened purpose.

Dr. W. W. Davis, who has so ably assisted the faithful pastor, Rev. J. B. Workman, in a number of the meetings, is expeected here today and will remain for several day.

BITTINGER.

The past week has been a period of almost ideal winter weather and the change from former rainy and generally unsettled conditions is enjoyed by all.

Dr. H. R. Boyer, of Accident, was greeting his friends here last week.

William Ralston spent last Saturday night and Sunday with his mother at her home near this village.

Asa J. Orendorf was a caller in town last Sunday.

Mahlon Warnick, of Jennings, was an early caller in this place last Monday morning.

C. E. Ellithorp attended the meeting of the School Commissioners at Oakland last week.

Misses Bertha Wiley and Ella Ralston attended the dance at Jennings last Saturday evening.

The writer had the pleasure of hearing Mahlon Brenneman's new Edison phonograph last Sunday and we do not hesitate to pronounce the machine an excellent one.

Albert Brenneman and Lewis Orendorf are rejoicing over the arrival of baby girls at their respective homes on February 6th.

Lot's Choice.

Abram probably followed the great desert highway which still exists between the East and Damascus, the very same, probably, that his grandson Jacob took in his flight from his angry brother. To all outward appearances, Abram's company probably exactly resembled the caravan which the traveler in the East sees today. There were the camels, "ships of the desert," bearing their precious freight of women and children, besides provisions and merchandise. There were the flocks and herds and their attendants, besides the armed guard. The oak or oak grove of Moreh in Sichem is the first-mentioned camping-place of the patriarch within the bounds of the promised land. Abram's first recorded act is significant. Columbus standing on the shore of the New World, unfurled the standard of Ferdinand. Abram, coming into Canaan, built an altar to God. So it became his custom. "Where Abraham had a tent, God had an altar." These became a series of "sermons in stone" to the idol-worshiping Canaanites.

The first mention made of Abraham on his return from his enforced sojourn in Egypt is concerning his wealth. The statement of the artless narrative is simply, "Abraham was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold." God's promises of temporal blessings had an early fulfillment. Kitto's computations are curious rather than reliable. On the data of the possessions of Jacob and Job he estimates Abraham as having between eight and nine thousand head. Of course, such immense herds and flocks would imply a correspondingly large number of attendants. From the incident of the equipment of three hundred and eighteen men for war it may be figured that there were something over a thousand men in the camp, not to mention women and children.

Up to this time Abraham and Lot had shared the pleasures and hardships of their pilgrim life. But now the herds of both had increased "so that the land was not able to bear them that they might dwell together." So, as sometimes occurs to this day, the herdsmen became rivals, and strove for pasturage and water. In this incident Abraham's character shines resplendent. Two thousand years before Christ he showed the Christian spirit when he said to Lot, "Let there be no strife between me and thee and between my herdsmen and thy herdsmen: for we are brethren." Nor are these mere words. Abraham backs them up. He waives his right. The land was his. It was all his. Yet in noble magnanimity he said to Lot: "Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me. If thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left."

Lot's selfishness crops out. He took advantage of Abraham's generosity. He casts his eye on the well-watered plain of Jordan, and chose it. He journeyed east. It was not long before he exchanged pastoral life for urban. He attempted the impossible. A double service—God and riches—met the inveterate and historic outcome.

Another incident in the career of Lot is the occasion of the display of new traits in the admirable character of Abraham, decision, bravery, military skill. Lot is in trouble. The very wealth he coveted and the richness of the land he chose was the cause of it. A rumor brings tidings of a predatory incursion and of Lot's captivity. Abraham determines his course instantly. Lot must be rescued. Three companies of trained servants, born in his camp, are armed: and Abraham takes command in person. Strategy gains a victory. Generosity declines the spoils.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Biography composes a large part of Scripture. God's Book has a deal by man in it. It is well it is so. Men of the Bible stand for ideas: Abel, innocence; Noah, obedience; Jacob, persistence; Moses, law; Aaron, worship, Joshua, courage; David, praise; Solomon, wisdom; Jeremiah, patriotism; Paul, zeal; John, love. Thus God teaches by example. Example is better than precept.

* * * * *

Want a boy to love his country, give him the life of a patriot; to be successful in business, give him the life of one of the "Captains of industry." So God deals with His larger children: gives us examples. Good for imitation, bad for avoidance.

* * * * *

So, in studying Bible characters we are not to entertain ourselves with trivial incident but to find what they stand for, the virtue or the vice they incarnate.

* * * * *

Biography of the Bible reaches its highest note in the life of Jesus. Christianity, in final analysis, is the religion of a Person; not of a dogma, creed, or system of theology or ecclesiasticism. At heart of it is the Person. Truth is so shrined in Him that He could say, "I am Truth."

* * * * *

There is one little passage in the account of Abram's entrance to the promised land. It might escape the superficial reader, but is worthy of attention. "And the Canaanite was then in the land." The patriarch came into the land the Lord had indicated to him, only to find it preoccupied. He might have reasoned,—"How can I ever, with my paltry band, drive out these warlike nations?" The incident seems not to have given him any concern. Fact is, he was not reasoning. He was trusting.

* * * * *

Again, there was something besides Canaanites. "There was a famine." What, in the land which was to flow in milk and honey! Abraham did not fret. He did the wise thing. He went to Egypt on a visit.

BLOOMINGTON.

The outbreak of diphtheria which occurred at Oss' Mill is under complete control and no new cases have occurred. The premises in which the disease made its appearance have been thoroughly fumigated and disinfected and the quarantine lifted. Work has been resumed at the mill and every thing is moving along as usual.

Messrs. Thos. Swann, Edward Devine, Charles Moody and Russell Pattison attended the Eagles banquet on last Wednesday night, at Piedmont.

From present indications Mr. Ground Hog's instinct is not to be ignored in weather prophecies.

The great and only Hugh Tate, of Cumberland, was in town Tuesday. Tate was here signing up players for the Sioux City team. He has Ross Raley on the string and probably one or two more from this place.

Ex-County Commissioner Stump is home nursing a very painful injury to his right knee caused by falling on the ice last Monday at noon. Mr. Stump was on his way home from Rawlings with an obstinate mule in tow. A balky mule, an icy road, a smooth horse are three conditions to produce trouble to the best horseman in the world.

This seem to be the time of the year and just the right kind of weather for an attack on the Devil's Stronghold.

Reports from this and neighboring towns tell of an unusual number of revivals going on and many additions to the churches interested in the work. Up at Blaine one of the greatest revivals in the history of the town is now in progress in the M. E. Church. Over five score persons has professed conversion and the meeting, which is only about three weeks old is still full of the liveliest kind of an interest. Some of the most prominent and inflential citizens in the town have connected themselves with the church and are nightly lending their aid for bettering the condition of that community.

Mr. Joseph Kight, of Beryl, narrowly escaped death on W. Md. R. R. bridge at the Junction, on Tuesday night. Mr. Kight was on his way to Piedmont and when about half way across the bridge he noticed No. 3, two and a half hours late, rounded the curve on the opposite end of the bridge. He turned and made a desperate effort to beat the train across and had nearly succeeded, when he was struck by the engine and knocked down the embankment at the west end of the bridge substaining a broken ankle and an ugly cut in the back of the head.

A very pretty wedding occurred at Barnum on last Sunday afternoon at 5 o'clock when Miss Eva Victoria Burke, eldest daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. N. Burke, was united in marriage to Mr. Richard Grant of the same place. The ceremony took place at the home of the bride's parents and was witnessed by quite a number of invited friends and relatives of both families. Rev. Youst of the M. E. Church South, was the officiating minister, with Mr. Fred Hartman, of Barnum, in charge of the weddidg march. Mr. Cornelius Cramer, of Barnum, as best man and Miss May Durham, of the same place, as bride's maid led the wedding procession. After the wedding a sumptious supper was served. The young couple will make Barnum their home where the groom is employed by the Monroe Coal Mining Company

Mr. James Rowe and little son, of Blaine, spent a few days of this week in town with relatives.

Wm. Barnard, of Big Vein, son of Otha Barnard of this place, was here on Sunday.

Messrs. John Jose and Edward Wilson, of Barnum, were here last Monday on business.

A dwelling house at the saw mill operated by Mr. Zeiler a few miles from town was burned to the ground on Wednesday. The fire is supposed to have originated from an over heated stove pipe. The men were away from home at their work at the time and lost nearly all their clothing.

AMERICAN FINDS CROWN OF QUEENS OF EGYPT.

Coffin A Superb Example of Jeweler's Work.

Another sensational discovery has been made at Thebes.

Theodore M. Davis, the discoverer of the tomb of the parents of the Egyptian Queen Mele, has just discovered the tomb and mummy of Queen Mele herself. Mele was the mother and inspirer of the famous "Heretic King" of Egyptology.

The tomb is a plain, square sepulchre cut out of the rock, and adjoins the tomb of Rameses IX. Unfortunately, the tomb lay in the bed of a watercourse, and owing to the percolation of the water through the rock, such perishable objects as wood and the royal mummy itself have suffered severely. Apart from this, the tomb, when it was entered, was in the same condition in which it had been left by priests amid the throes of a religious revolution that had spent its force before Moses was born. The tomb of Mele bears witness to the blind rage of the victorious priesthood of Thebes and the intensity of their hatred toward the Heretic King, whose name they carefully erased from every article in the tomb on which it had been inscribed.

The men, however, who thus violated the tomb were no common thieves. The jewelry of the Queen and the sheets of solid gold with which the sepulchre was literally filled were left untouched. Wherever the excavators walked they trod upon fragments of gold plate and gold leaf. The coffin is intact, and is a superb example of jeweler's work. The wood of which it was composed is entirely covered with a frame of gold inlaid with lapis lazuli, cornelian and green glass.

The mummy itself was wrapped from head to foot in sheets of gold. The water which had been for so many ages draining through it had reduced it to little more than pulp, and it fell to pieces when examined in the presence of several Egyptologists on January 26.

There were bracelets on the arms and a necklace of gold beads and ornaments of gold inlaid with precious stones around the Queen's neck, while her head was still encircled by an object priceless and unique—the imperial crown of the Queens of ancient Egypt.

It is simple and exquisitely fashioned, and represents a royal vulture holding a signet ring in each talon, while its wings surround the head and are fastened at the tips behind by a pin. The whole is of solid gold, without ornament.

It was difficult to avoid a feeling of awe when handling this symbol of ancient sovereignty, thus risen up from the depths of a vanished world.

When, two years ago, Theodore M. Davis, of New York and Newport excavated in the famous Valley of the Kings at Thebes the tomb of Queen Mele's parents, the discovery was hailed by Professor Maspero and others as the greatest in the history of Egyptology. Mr. Davis' latest discovery is undoubtedly even more important than that of the unviolated tomb he laid bare in 1905.

Queen Mele—sometimes spelled Teye—was the wife of Amen-Hotep III, one of the Pharaohs of the Eighteenth Dynasty. He reigned for 36 years, from about 140 B. C., and he chose as his principal wife a woman not of royal blood, but the beautiful Mele. It had long been believed that she was of Mesopotamian descent, and this theory was corroborated by inscriptions found by Mr. Davis in the tomb of Yua and Thua, her parents.

Mele's son, Amen-Hotep IV, is one of the most interesting characters in Egyptian history because of the religious reform he attempted. He endeavored to replace the old religion of Egypt by the exclusive worship of the sun, but his attempt left no permanent results. After his reign of 18 years his innovations were abolished and the old religion was reintroduced. It is beleived that Mele was largely responsible for her son's religious opinions.

Mr. Davis when in America usually lives at his Newport cottage, the Reef. He is a member of the Downtown, National Arts, Union League and Whist Clubs of New York.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

The sixteenth president of the United States and the most far-seeing statesman this country ever produced, Abraham Lincoln, was born in Hardin county, Kentucky, February 12, 1809. His family were of Quaker and Pennsylvania origin. In 1816 his father settled in Spencer county, Indiana, and for ten years the future president was employed at hard manual labor on the paternal farm. The time spent by him at school, to which he went at intervals, did not amount to more than a year. At 19 he was six feet four, and his physical capabilities were remarkable. When, in 1834, his father removed to Macon county, Illinois, Abraham not only helped to build the family log hut, but with a single assistant split rails enough to fence ten acres of land. In 1831 he worked to New Orleans a flat boat which he had assisted in building. He became then for a time a clerk in the New Salem store of the owner of the boat, and in 1832 entered, and was made captain of, a company of volunteers raised on the breaking out of the Black Hawk War. Unsuccessful in the country store which he opened, he was appointed postmaster of New Salem, and—borrowing from a neighboring practitioner law books, to be returned in the morning—spent his evenings in the study of law. In 1834 he was elected a member of the state legislature and he continued to be re-elected till 1840. In 1836 he had been licensed to practice as a lawyer, and in 1837, commenced business at Springfield, his residence until he was elected president. As a lawyer he became rapidly successful, and in politics he rose to be a prominent leader of the Whig party in Illinois. In 1844 he canvassed the state making speeches almost daily in behalf of Henry Clay for the Presidency. In 1846 he was elected to congress. He distinguished himself as an opponent to the annexation of Texas, and of the extension of slavery, and as a supporter of its abolition in the District of Columbia. He advocated a protective tariff, the sale of public lands at a low price, and the system of grants for the improvement of rivers and harbors. When his term ended he pursued the practice of his profession until the repeal of the Missouri Compromise recalled him to active political life. Through his exertions a Republican senator—the Whig party having become extinct—was returned by Illinois. In the presidential election of 1856 he worked strenuously for Fremont, and his own name was mentioned in connection with the vice-presidency. In 1856 he ran against Douglas as a Republican candidate for the senate, and after a spirited contest Lincoln secured a large majority of the popular vote—the state legislature, however, returning Douglas. The struggle with Douglas placed Lincoln in the foremost rank of his party, and the Republican National Convention which met in Chicago May 16, 1860, nominated him for the presidency. He was elected in November following. Before the time came to take his seat, South Carolina and other southern states had seceded, and under the vacillating policy of Buchanan were able to make all their preparations for war.

Lincoln's administration was largely devoted to the suppression of this formidable secession. In these dark days the wisdom, sagacity and patience of Lincoln were proved to the country. On January 1, 1863, he issued the Emancipation Proclamation, by which more than 4,000,000 slaves were set free. English opinion pronounced it the noblest political document known in history, and in the verdicts of mankind it has taken its place with the Magna Charta and the Declaration of Independence. His other state papers are among the greatest in the archives of statesmanship.

After the battle of Gettysburg, and various brilliant victories, the popular confidence in his administration became limitless, and was re-elected by increased majorities in 1864, and early in the following year he witnessed the triumph of his policy, and the end of the Civil War. He had served but little more than a month of his second term when he was assassinated.

The foregoing brief sketch of this notable man is not news—it is known of all men. But Lincoln's was so loveable a character and withal his life was so well rounded and complete that it would be hard to find in the annals of men a character more worthy the emulation of all. Success should not be reckoned by the number of dollars a man possesses—at least this should not be the only touchstone. If this were the only measure of success then were Lincoln a decided and dismal failure, for he was poor— never was rich in this world's goods. But to say he was not a success is very far from the truth. History has reserved a beautiful and bright page for him. Among men he stands a giant in intellect and achievement. The parchment sacred to the famed of earth contains, side by side, the names of Washington and Lincoln. It is impossible to think of one without having the other brought to mind. And the greater of the two is Lincoln.

Couldn't Wait a Minute.

A Pittsburg man who suddenly acquired riches was desirous of purchasing a fast horse. He went to a dealer, who sold him an animal and guaranteed that he could trot a mile in 2:10. He took his purchase home and the next day drove down to the track to try him. Much to his disgust, the best the horse could do was a mile in 3:10. He returned to the dealer in a rage and said:

"You told me this horse could trot a mile in 2:10. He can't go a mile better than 3:10."

The dealer looked at him a minute and said:

"Well, what of that? Are you in such a terrible hurry you can't wait a minute?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

your correspondent.
Dont write him anything by hand that takes him time to make out—that may leave him in doubt—that he can't easily read.
And don't fill out legal papers or card memos—Or make out accounts of hotel menus in your own handwriting.
It looks bad, reflects on your standing, makes people think you can't afford a stenographer, and is sometimes ambiguous.
You can write out your letters—make out an abstract—fill in an insurance policy—enter your card memos—make out your accounts, or a hotel menu—or do any kind of writing you need, on any kind, size or thickness of paper, and space any way you want on

The OLIVER Typewriter

The Standard Visible Writer.

You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.
Write us now for our booklet on the simplified features of the OLIVER.

THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS.

One of the cherished sentiments of this country is that the press should be untrammeled in its reports of actual occurrences and its discussion of questions of public interest, or of no interest at all, for that matter, to anybody. But like all other privileges, guaranteed by custom and popular opinion, this freedom, at times, becomes dangerously close to license.

It is true, the Postoffice Department has stepped in, on numerous occasions, and stopped the use of the mails for the transmission of journals, papers, circulars, &c., containing matters deemed immoral and objectionable. This places a certain wholesome restraint upon the license of the press, if not upon its freedom. But even this is not always effective to prevent the dissemination of opinions, as well as of facts, which do not tend to promote morality. Quite recently a prominent periodical, with a wide circulation, contained an article on the increase of the world's population, (to phrase its meaning in the least objectionable language,) in which some things that it seems to us unwise to have put in the way of children, were told in language almost too plain to be esteemed decent. Yet this periodical, which is a very popular one and goes into many homes and falls into the hands of young girls, youths and children, went through the mails without protest. We think its transmission was, to some extent at least, a stretch of the freedom of the press.

Just now and for months past the daily newspapers of the country have been filled with details of the life and habits of Harry K. Thaw, who is being tried in New York City for the murder of Stanford White, and of the former relations of White with Thaw's wife before her marriage. Thaw is the son of a deceased multi-millionaire of Pittsburg, Pa., and his sister is the wife of an English nobleman. This makes the case a conspicuous one and, naturally, more space would be devoted to it than if they were people of ordinary standing; but, apparently, it is the uncleanness of the past life of Thaw and his wife, and the victim of Thaw's revolver, which have given the case its greatest notoriety and caused volumes of stories to be written and published in the daily newspapers throughout the land. While the language used in these stories has been, for the most part, guarded and free from open impurity it has been too suggestive to have been misunderstood, and the prurient tale, repeated again and again, in some form or other, has been read with avidity by all classes of people, young and old. The effect of this, to say the least of it, is not beneficial to the morals of the readers, but the press is seemingly free to tell these stories. It is deplorable that such a condition exists. The postoffice department recently ruled against the transmission through the mails of newspapers which publish accounts of gambling projects, a matter probably less harmful than the Thaw stories. This was an abridgment of the absolute freedom of the press in a matter affecting public morals, and as this can be done, why might not some restriction be placed upon the dissemination of such prurient stories as that of the Thaws?

ELDER.

Not seeing any news from our section in your valuable paper for some time, I thought I would write some.

Everybody seems to be enjoying the sleighing at this writing.

Mr. William McKeen, of this place, who has been working away for some time, is home on a visit.

Mrs. Alice Thayer, who has been on the sick list for sometime, is recovering.

Mr. A. P. Enlow has been hauling quite a number of mine props to Friendsville this winter.

Mrs. Wm. McKeen and little daughter are both on the sick list, but we hope they will soon recover.

Miss Julia Enlow was home Sunday on a visit.

Mr. Arthur Custer and Miss Ethel Dewitt were out sleighing last Thursday night.

Miss Bertha Custer and brother Arthur were visiting their brother, D. S. Custer, at Friendsville Sunday last.

Letter to C. A. Ashby.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: A man fed his hens half meal and half sawdust; he thought they wouldn't know the difference. He concluded they did when the eggs hatched woodpeckers.

Another man painted his house with a paint that was made of half paint-substitutes. He didn't know the difference—not till he paid the painter.

He had 20 gallons to pay for, 20 instend of 10. Got fooled $12.50 on the paint.

He had 20 days' wages to pay-for, 20 instead of 10. Fooled $30 in wages.

He got a poor job besides. He paid too much for his eggs, and they hatched woodpeckers.

Yours truly,

All Run Down

THIS is a common expression we hear on every side. Unless there is some organic trouble, the condition can doubtless be remedied. Your doctor is the best adviser. Do not dose yourself with all kinds of advertised remedies—get his opinion. More than likely you need a concentrated fat food to enrich your blood and tone up the system.

Scott's Emulsion of Cod Liver Oil is just such a food in its best form. It will build up the weakened and wasted body when all other foods fail to nourish. If you are run down or emaciated, give it a trial: it cannot hurt you. It is essentially the best possible nourishment for delicate children and pale, anaemic girls. We will send you a sample free.

Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

THE JOURNEY FROM TEXAS TO THE MEXICAN BORDER

Mr. Kelso Adds Another Interesting Letter to the Series.

To the Editor of The Republican.

On my return from Las Cruces to El Paso we traveled several miles along the bank of the Rio Grande River, and while viewing the meandering current it occurred to my mind: It held the key of destiny for irrigating thousands of acres and adding great wealth to many towns.

El Paso has a union depot, eight railroads, thirty miles of street car lines, ore smelters, employing seventeen hundred men, machine shops and various other industries.

Montana street has nearly a mile of fine brick residences, built in the last four years. The altitude of El Paso is 3,800 feet, the climate dry and healthy. I was told that most of the business men and mechanics came here for their health, and the climate was so beneficial they became permanent citizens.

To the visitor who approaches the Mexican border for the first time "the other side" is the cheif point of attraction, Ciudad Juarez lies just across the river from El Paso, and is reached by an electric car line. Juarez with its 8,000 people is typically Mexican. The old church built in 1539, with its massive adobe walls, the amphitheatre for bull fighting, the plaza, the streets, the dwellings, curio shops, the personal appearance, dress and customs of the people are all full of novelty and interest to the American visitor.

While here we saw decrepit Mexicans, who had the appearance of being a hundred years old. Mexican women are habitual cigarette smokers.

While on the streets we noticed several donkeys loaded with wood. A padded blanket is placed on the donkey's back and the wood is lashed on with ropes. I tried to lift one end, but I found that it was heavier than I cared to lift. The donkeys are driven through the streets by a Mexican seeking purchasers for the wood, at one dollar a load.

The market house is very interesting, and is conducted exclusively by Mexicans. They have a great variety of vegetables and meat, including venison. Also in the market they have for sale game roosters.

On my return I traveled in day time where I traveled at night on the out trip.

I traveled a long distance through a rough, broken country that is very poor grazing land. On the eastern slope of the rough land we crossed the Pecos river in a canon 321 feet high from bed of river. Further on we reached good land and sleek cattle. I was told of a rancher who recently sold 3,000 four-year-old cattle, half Hereford, for $43 per head loaded on cars.

Good land is enhancing in value and ranchers are dividing their lands into suitable tracts and selling to settlers at from $5 to $20 per acre.

On arriving in San Antonio we visited many points of interest, which we omitted on our outward trip. In Travis Park are buried the heroes of the Alamo and a granite monument is erected to their memory. About five miles from the center of the city, near the suburbs, are a portion of the stone walls of David Crockett's house. Relic hunters are depleting its walls, and it is only a matter of time when it will be entirely carried away.

In Breckenridge Park are four buffalo, twenty elk, and thirty deer.

There are many fine suburbs, which are reached by street cars. Five railroads center in the city. I was told that there is a transient population of 10,000 tourists in the city of San Antonio during the winter.

Leaving San Antonio we traveled, via Victoria, through a fine agricultural and stock country. Thousands of acres are devoted to raising rice. Farmers are preparing the ground to seed in rice from March to May. Considerable oats have been sowed and is now about six inches high, and will be ready to harvest in time to sow rice in May.

Further on we came to Sugarland, a small town, containing a sugar refinery, which is surrounded by a large body of land, suitable for raising sugar cane.

Further on we reached Houston. Twelve railroads enter this city, which is a very pretty and business-like place. Here they have many up-to-date office buildings, which would be a credit to a city of twice its size. Also many beautiful public buildings, such as high schools, churches, city hall and library. Strawberries are on the market in profusion, as well as all spring vegetables.

Fifty miles south of Houston is Galveston, and having read much of her misfortune, we desired to visit the city since she emerged from the flood of 1900.

Between Houston and Galveston is a Japanese colony engaged in raising rice, and beyond this colony vegetables and strawberries are raised, of the latter, quart boxes of fresh berries from the patch were offered at 15 cents a box on the cars. A few years past hundreds of acres of pear trees were planted in this section, but just about the time the owners were getting a revenue the blight struck the trees and they are all practically dead.

When crossing the bay we saw evidences of the flood, in the way of pilings. Where there were two bridges, only one bridge spans the bay now, but arrangements are made to have a fill made across the bay in the near future, of sufficient width for several roads. The bay is two miles wide.

The sea wall along the Gulf Coast is four miles long. The dimensions at base 16 feet, 17 feet high, 6 feet wide on top, and is built on piling driven 32 feet. The wall is built of concrete, and circular on the inside next to the Gulf. The wall cost three million dollars. Contractors from Holland have the contract for filling back of wall and under the city at 18½ cents per square yard. The company built a temporary canal from the bay through the city. They pump sand from the bay on large dredges and haul on canal to end of streets and pump through large flumes, the sand settling and the water running off. Houses are raised from four to seventeen feet, according to the surface of the ground. Owners of property pay for raising houses, and the city pays for the filling. It costs $7,000 to have large houses raised.

A Catholic brick church 50 x 150 feet is in process of being raised and will cost $7,000.

They have been two years filling the city of Galveston and it will take two years longer. The canal will be filled and buildings erected. As the streets are filled they are paved, and eventually all will be paved.

There are many costly residences in the city and they claim to have thirty-seven millionaires living in Galveston.

E. W. KELSO.

NEW GERMANY.

Snow and ice is the order of the day.

Our school is progressing nicely under the management of Miss Anna Reilly, with a large attendance.

Mr. James L. Durst and sister, Susie, made a flying trip to Salisbury one day last week.

Our school house decoration committee has made a great improvement in the appearance of the school building by decorating it.

The young people of New Germany have been having crowds of sleighing parties this winter.

Mr. Olin Broadwater, while returning from C. J. Otto's last Sunday night, had a fierce battle with a wild cat, which injured him very badly.

Mrs. Fannie Wagner, of Springs, Pa., was visiting her home last week.

Mr. Elbert Michael, of Firm Rock, was a pleasant guest of J. W. Stark's Sunday last.

Miss Sarah Durst has gone to Springs to work for a few months.

Mr. Christian Yommer, of Jennings, made a business trip to David Broadwater's last week.

Mr. Ross Durst and Miss Oma Weitzell were at Oakland last week.

Quite a number of our young men are employed at Bond.

Mr. James Stephen has the contract of hauling logs at Firm Rock, for Elbert Michael.

Mr. Henry Merrill was in this vicinity on a business negotiation with W. D. Broadwater, the merchant.

Mrs. Zura Durst, from "out west," is visiting her many friends and relatives in this section.

Miss Nellie Durst, who had been at Firm Rock is now at Will Michael's.

The farmers are busy cutting their summer's supply of ice which is in good condition.

Miss Sadie Durst, who had been at Meyersdale for some time, has returned home on a short vacation.

Mrs. Henry Broadwater, who had been very ill, is recovering rapidly.

Mr. Ross Compton, who had emigrated to the south, has returned and is visiting friends at this place.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

While the trusts by extortion increase living expenses, there is no economy in bachelorhood. From an economic point of view, it is far easier to get along with a wife than without one. In the death of Mr. William C. Broadwater, of Grantsville, as noted in another column of this paper today, Garrett county has lost another of its pioneer and prominent citizens. Mr. Broadwater had attained the ripe old age of more than ninety-four years and until quite recently was in possession of all his faculties.

There should be no faction in our little city. There should be a mutual interest in the prosperity of our people. When we see indifference to the well being of its citizens, we see a town all wise men shun. Success and failure are each a part of life and often those who have made the hardest fight are vanquished in the race.

In another column of this paper today Mr. L. T. Yoder, proprietor of the Mountain Lake Park Hotel, offers the hotel for lease. The house has a capacity of 140 guests; has a private electric lighting plant and stable with several vehicles, single and double harness, etc. Mr. Yoder's city address is Hotel Yoder, 1112 Forbes street, Pittsburg, Pa.

At the termination the public school term which closes in April Prof. Morris K. Turner, principal of the Oakland High School, will open a normal school for a term of ten weeks. This prominent educator has made more staunch friends throughout the county in the short length of time he has been engaged in the work of education in this section than any other man we know of. His friends are legion, and may be found in all walks of life. It is the hope of the friends of public education that Prof. Turner will remain at the head of the High School in Oakland indefinitely.

THE DEATH RECORD.

JOHN SMITH.

Died, last night, John Smith, aged 87 years, at the residence of John Lipscomb, with whom he made his home. The deceased was partaking of his supper when a small piece of bone slipped down his throat which strangled him to death. His former home was in Preston county, West Va.

MRS. A. BROOKS FLEMING, JR.

Mrs. A. Brooks Fleming, Jr., died at Columbus, Ohio, on Saturday, and her funeral took place Monday afternoon from the home of ex-Governor A. Brooks Fleming, at Fairmont, W. Va. Mr. and Mrs. Fleming were married in November last and she was stricken with typhiod fever while on a visit to her mother at Columbus. She was a niece by marriage of Mr. Clarence W. Watson, president of the Consolidation Coal Company.

MRS. CATHARINE SLAUBAUGH.

Died, at her late residence in Bloomington, Ill., on Monday, the 11th inst., Mrs. Catharine Slaubaugh, widow of the late David Slaubaugh, who preceded his wife to the grave more than ten years ago. Mrs. Slaubaugh was the sister of Mr. Peter P. Lohr, of Oakland, and was married in the year 1861 to her deceased husband. In the year 1865 the couple removed from Garrett county and located at Bloomington, where they made their permanent home. One son survives. Mrs. Slaubaugh was eighty-five years of age. Her funeral took place yesterday from her late home.

JOHN PFEIFFER.

At the Soldiers' Home, Dayton, Ohio, on Sunday, February 10th, 1907, after a brief illness, John Pfeiffer, aged nearly 71 years. Mr. Pfeiffer was for a great many years a resident of Oakland, going to the Soldiers' Home last October. He was an ex-Union soldier with an unexcelled record for bravery and obedience, a member of the Oakland Lutheran church and by birth a German. He leaves a number of children, among them being Mrs. George Little, of Oakland. His funeral took place at Dayton on Tuesday, the interment being made in the soldiers' cemetery in that city.

MRS. CATHARINE TOWNSHEND-CRANE.

At her home in Parkersburg, West Va., Tuesday at midnight, Mrs. Catharine Townshend-Crane, daughter of the late Singleton L. Townshend and Mrs. Elizabeth R. Townshend, of Oakland. The cause of Mrs. Crane's death was due to nervous prostration with which she suffered for two weeks previous to her demise. She was born in Oakland on December 24th, 1861, and was aged 45 years, 1 month and 19 days. Mrs. Crane was twice married, her first husband being the late Marshall Crane, of Terra Alta, who died about eighteen years ago, and to which union one son, Wellington, was born, who survives. About three years ago she married Mr. Fuller Crane, of Parkersburg. Her remains will arrive here this evening on train No. 12 and will be conveyed to the family residence on Water street. The funeral will take place tomorrow afternoon at 2.30 from St. Paul's M. E. church of which the deceased had been a member from early childhood. Mrs. Crane was held in high esteem by her acquaintances and the news of her death came as a great shock to them.

WILLIAM C. BROADWATER.

Mr. William C. Broadwater died at his home in Grantsville on Saturday morning, at the age of 94 years and 5 months. Mr. Broadwater was one of the pioneers of that section and a veritable store of historical knowledge concerning the early days of this section of the state. He is survived by five children, as follows: Mrs. Nimrod Glotfelty, Mrs. J. L. Augustine, Mrs. Eli Stanton, Mr. Noah Broadwater and Mr. Gilead Broadwater, all of Grantsville and vicinity.

The funeral took place Tuesday morning at eleven o'clock from the M. E. church at Grantsville, Rev. Theophilus McCoy, pastor, officiating. Interment in Grantsville cemetery.

Concerning Mr. Broadwater the following extract is taken from Mr. Jacob Brown's "Miscellaneous Writings," a book of handy reference to the newspaper man as well as others who desire knowledge concerning the pioneer settlers of Garrett county:

"William C. Broadwater, another son of Charles, is quite a prominent member of the name. He is sometimes called "King Billy" on account of his prominence and wealth. He, too, is a farmer, without any other combination, but he broke away from the highlands of the Savage some years ago, bought and move upon the Shultz farm at Grantsville. This is a genial farm, but it would hardly have filled the discriminating eye of the purchaser were it not for the bluffs that look down upon the curves of the Casselman. He practices farming in an intelligent and judicial manner upon the southern division of "Cornucopia"—named 113 years ago after the fabled overflowing horn. King William is approaching his fourscore, but in good physical and mental condition—a widower for several years with a large family of sons and daughters, grown and well situated in life. His son James is a successful and enterprising merchant in Grantsville, married to the amiable and accomplished Practical politics have been made one of the great vices of the day."

After an absence of two months from her Garrett county home, Mrs. G. W. Haulenbeek returned to Deer Park on Sunday last. She was the recipient of much attention while in Baltimore, and her visit extending from the first Sunday in December was a very pleasant one. She prefers the climate of the mountains, however, even in the winter.

Mr. Charles E. Hoye, who left Oakland the latter part of October for the Philippines, being accompanied by his wife and little daughter, arrived at Manila on January 3rd, well and after a pleasant and uneventful voyage. In another column Mr. Hoye describes the trip and the good time the passengers of the vessel in which he sailed had on Christmas Day.

This is the age of women. We find all the avocations, professions and trades of life opening their doors to admit the enterprising woman. Some are going into their own, and some are going into other peoples's business. In our admiration for the new woman there is danger of forgetting the wife and mother and woman's true sphere as a home maker.

WANTED—Information as to address of Thomas H. Frost or widow or heirs if dead. He was born in Allegany county, Md., about 1839, and served in Co. A, First W. Va. Cav., in the Civil War. About 1873 he lived in Colorado. Small recovery can probably be made. Address Harvey Spalding & Sons, Washington, D. C.

Mr. J. W. Alderton, who is president of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company, arrived in Oakland yesterday afternoon to be present at a meeting of the company to be held here this afternoon, when definite action will be taken looking to the erection of the derrick and other necessary buildings preliminary to the installation of machinery for sinking a well in search of oil and gas.

Yesterday Mr. John Harned, living near Hutton, who is well known in all parts of Garrett county as the County Surveyor for many years, celebrated his eighty-first anniversary when he entertained his son Joseph E. Harned and family of Oakland, and other relatives and friends. Notwithstanding his advanced years Mr. Harned is yet a remarkably active man and has the faculty of remaining young despite his age. May he live to celebrate many more anniversaries of his birth.

In the Circuit Court for this county proceedings have been instituted by Attorney Julius C. Renninger, who is counsel for the Board of County Commissioners, to condemn the Crim property on Alder street the land mentioned in the condemnation proceedings being required for the site for the new court house. We understand that the owners of the property have been offered a fair price for the same, but refuse to sell at the price offered, hence the proceedings in Court.

Our idea of a good citizens, and we are glad there are many in this community, is one always ready to give, according to his means, to community enterprises. He takes stock in them all, and doesn't lose his faith if an occasional venture proved bad. He is not afraid to buy real estate and to pay what it is worth. He talks up his town at home and abroad, thinks it is the healthiest place on earth, believing it to be destined to be the biggest city in its section and wants to be buried here when he dies. And he's worth a whole regiment of the lukewarn kind.

JUDGE KEEDY'S POINTED CHARGE TO GRAND JURY.

Cigarettes Are As Injurious to a Boy As Bad Whiskey.

At the opening of the Court for Washington county Monday Judge Keedy delivered the charge to the grand jury, and denounced certain infractions of the law in a very forcible manner.

The court instructed the grand jury along the lines of its oath taken by its foreman, indicting or excusing no man out of fear, of love, favor or malice. Likewise secrecy should be observed in every respect about matters taking place in grand jury room. The court said he had known where grand jurors had violated their oath and spoke out in public secrets of importance. Likewise have I known said the court, where jurors did not do their duty because fearful of a little trade; a man doing that is a coward, no less. No matter how it sounds, a man who fails to do his duty either for business, fears or favors is a coward.

Of course grand jurors are not perfect. If you had to be, we would dispense with grand jurors, the laws and all, but human nature is not perfect. We do what we can.

If you want a witness, get him. You have the power. If a summons goes forth, do not fail to bring witness. It begets indifference to the law to have men to be summoned and ignore you.

The court then, raking the cigarette habit, called the attention of the jury to the fact complained of as to cigarettes being sold to boys under 16 some are failing evidently to attend to their duty, he said. Perhaps a member of the bar, who has complained of it, can give you some information.

Now gentlemen of the jury, said the judge, I regard cigarettes as physically bad for a boy as whiskey. I want to remind you that if any violator of this law is convicted before me, I will visit no light or insignificant punishment. The cigarette habit is a vile evil; it deterioates and undermines the health of young boys, and anyone defying the law by selling this deadly form of tobacco to boys under 16, willfully and maliciously selling them, is selling them something I regard as more physically harmful than whiskey, especially when we consider the tender years of the lads who smoke them. I do not lightly speak of this, I am serious, and I want your attention directed to finding out who makes such sales to boys and have the dealers presented.

Caught on a Trestle.

Joseph Kight, living near Bloomington, was knocked off the railroad bridge at the West Virginia Junction, near Luke, on Saturday. He was crossing the bridge enroute to Piedmont, when he saw a train coming. He retraced his steps but before he could clear the bridge he was struck, sustaining a broken ankle and a severe wound on the head.

One Hundred Conversions at Blaine.

Up at Blaine, W. Va., one of the greatest revivals in the history of the town, is now in progress in the M. E. church. Over five score persons have professed conversion and the meeting, which is only about three weeks old, is still full of the liveliest kind of an interest.

The Mouse and the Lion.

By Constance D'Arcy Mackay.

Copyright, 1906, by P. C. Eastment.

"My dear," said Grace Seward as she crossed the wide hotel veranda, "who do you think has come?"

Marion Page looked up brightly from the book she was reading. "The king of Patagonia," she suggested.

"Nonsense, Marion! Don't be silly! This is really somebody out of the ordinary—a real social lion! I give you three guesses. Take the first."

"But I'm no good at guessing," protested Marion. "You'll have to tell me."

"Well, then, hold your breath! It's Burton Sturgis!"

"Burton Sturgis!" repeated Marion slowly.

"Isn't that a sensation?" cried Miss Seward, sinking into a chair at Marion's side with a swish of beruffled skirts. "Fancy such a great explorer, writer and statesman as he is choosing to stop at Windmere for a day! I've always been taught to suppose that such people avoided hotels in the height of the season, haven't you? But it seems he lived some place near here when he was a boy, and he wants to stop and see it on his way through. I suppose famous people always want to visit the haunts of their early life, don't they? And Mrs. Barrington-Sells happens to know him, so she's going to give a tea for him in one of the hotel cottages this afternoon."

"A tea?"

"Yes, a tea. You might know she'd never let a lion escape. It's in the Farquhar cottage, I believe, and you are to serve fruit punch."

"I?" echoed Marion.

"Yes, you. Mrs. Sells told me to tell you. She was coming to ask you herself, only there isn't time. It's nearly half past 10 now, and you haven't the faintest idea how much there is to be done before this afternoon. I should be scurrying about this minute instead of sitting here talking. There are oceans of people to be invited—all Mrs. Sells' friends—and the cottage to be put in order, and the decorations—we've simply robbed the flower beds. And Mrs. Sells wants to know if you won't take the trap this morning and get her some ferns and trailing vines. There are a lot up the road by Benders'. You know the way. I'd come with you, but I have to fill the vases and half a dozen other things."

"BUT THEY'RE SO ELUSIVE," LAUGHED MARION.

She skipped down the veranda steps and then paused. "What are you going to wear?" she asked.

"Mercy," laughed Marion, "I haven't had time to decide!"

"Well, then, I hope you'll choose your gray silk mull. It's perfectly fascinating. You look like a dear little mouse in it. I'm going to grace the occasion in pale blue. That's not a pun." And Miss Seward rushed across the lawn with the same impetuosity with which she had arrived.

A few moments later Marion drove briskly along the road, a scissors and garden knife on the seat beside her.

"To think," she mused, "that he should come today!"

For two years past Burton Sturgis had stood to her for an ideal, a hero to whom she had meted out a generous share of girlish hero worship. His books occupied a favorite corner of her bookshelf, and a picture of him, cut from a current magazine, was tucked away in a drawer of her desk. She had known that it was possible that she should some day meet him. Still she had not thought that it would be as soon as this. Indeed, she might have known him before had she made the effort to do so, but Grace Seward's description of her as a mouse suited her exactly.

"I'm afraid it doesn't take a gray gown to make me one either," she mourned as she stood cutting the vines, the sunlight glinting on her soft hair. "I'm not a bit good at gushing, like the other girls."

"A mere mouse," she repeated to herself that afternoon as she sat in a fern embowered corner of the tiny reception room behind a huge cut glass bowl filled with pineapple lemonade and its attendant sherbet cups and plates of delicate wafers. Beyond, in the drawing room, was a swirl of pink and white and blue, a mass of fluffy gowns and pretty wearers, and in the center of them the portly figure and triumphant face of Mrs. Barrington-Sells. Beside her, immaculate in white flannels, stood Burton Sturgis, a tall, thin man with a commanding profile and dark hair lightly touched with gray.

"He's just as I imagined he would be," murmured Marion, "even to the little bored look that settles around his eyes and the quick way he has of throwing back his head."

Every now and then a group of girls would drift up to her table with little exclamations and thrills of laughter. "Oh, thank you, Miss Page! How cool and delicious! Oh, girls, isn't Burton Sturgis fascinating, and aren't his books too lovely for anything? Let's go back and talk to him again." And the group would break away from Marion and return to the ring that surrounded the great man. From time to time Marion caught snatches of their feminine chatter. "Your charming books, Mr. Sturgis! Adorable! Quaint! Delicious!"

Presently Mrs. Sells broke away from her circle and waddled up to Marion with Burton Sturgis in tow.

"My dear," she wheezed, "let me present Mr. Sturgis. Mr. Sturgis, Miss Page. See that he has enough, Marion," and, playfully waving her pudgy hand at them, she went back to her other guests.

"It is a thirsty day," said Burton Sturgis, taking the sherbet cup that Marion held out to him. "Do you think you could manage to put in another cherry, Miss Page? I'm awfully fond of cherries."

"But they're so elusive," laughed Marion. "They always seem to slip out of the ladle. I just think I've caught one, and then it gets away."

"It's like the small boy and the minnow," agreed Burton Sturgis, his bored look giving place to a smile. "There! You've missed it again!" as a refractory cherry with a little splash sank to the bottom of the bowl.

"I doubt if you could do as well!" cried Marion.

"What do you bet?" he said boyishly.

"Two wafers and half a macaroon."

"Done!" He seized the ladle and was in the midst of an excited dipping when Mrs. Sells came toward him like a ship under full sail.

"They're calling for you, Mr. Sturgis," she said, "and this room is too small to hold them all. We shall be mobbed if we don't hurry."

He put down the ladle with a regretful look. "I suppose I'll have to, then," he said and followed her with lagging steps.

Marion leaned her chin on her hand and looked after him. Her moment of moments was over. She had met her idol face to face, and not one word had she spoken of all that his personality and work had meant to her in the past two years. A flush passed across her face. "I might at least have told him that I had read his books," she said to herself, "but it's too late now. I've had my chance and lost it. What a little stupid he must think me if he thinks of me at all!"

Then the line of chattering guests began to thin. One by one they were departing. Mrs. Barrington-Sells' round face was lit with contentment. It had been a most successful afternoon.

"Even she had something to say to him," thought Marion disconsolately. There was a quick step at her side. She looked up. It was Burton Sturgis.

"Well, that's over!" he cried, with a shrug of delight. "And, heavens, but I'm glad to be back in this corner with you! Do you know, Miss Page, you're the only girl this afternoon who hasn't said 'Quaint, lovely, charming and delicious!' I'd like another cherry, please. And will you do me a favor?"

"Delighted," cried Marion gayly.

"I've decided to stay over another day, and there's a place near here I'd like to show you if you'd care to see it. Will you come driving with me tomorrow?"

For an instant his eyes held hers. Understanding, humor, camaraderie and a something deeper than all these passed between them.

"I should be glad to," said Marion.

High Priced Elections.

A century ago elections in England were costly affairs. In one case half a million pounds was spent on one election alone. This was the great contest for Yorkshire, in which the candidates were Viscount Milton, the Hon. Henry Lascelles and Mr. Wilberforce. Wilberforce won at a cost of £58,000, "with every resource of the most rigid economy and great voluntary assistance in labor."

Mrs. Fanny Kemble tells us of another Yorkshire contest, where the money seems to have been spent just as freely. Mrs. Wentworth Beaumont is the heroine. "She, then a very old lady, drove in her traveling carriage to Downing street and, demanding to see the prime minister, with whom she was well acquainted, accosted him thus: 'Well, my lord, are you quite determined to make your man stand for our seat?' 'Yes,' Mrs. Beaumont, I think quite determined.' 'Very well,' replied the lady, 'I am on my way down to Yorkshire with £80,000 in the carriage for my man. Try and do better than that.'"—London Chronicle.

UNCLE ELI'S FABLES.

Morals Always at Hand For Those In Need of Them.

THE FARMER AND THE FOX.

How Uncle Reuben Threw Old Reynard Down and Showed His Ingratitude. Story of the Thief and Judge and the Grocer and the Sage.

[Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.]

One day as the farmer was grubbing out a stump in his field he was approached by a fox, who said:

"Uncle Reuben, I am no hand to butt in and mix myself up with other people's business, but I have come to give you a little pointer."

"Waal, that's kind o' you, though I ain't in need of any gold bricks jest at present."

"I am not that kind of fox. On the contrary, I am here to tell you that I overheard a conversation in the forest this morning and that the weasel intends to rob your henroost tonight. I am on friendly terms with him and shouldn't like him to know that I have given him away, but at the same time I don't want you to be a loser."

"I AM NOT THAT KIND OF A FOX."

"That's good of you," said the farmer. "No, I won't say a word to anybody about it, but if the durned critter comes I'll give him a surprise party. Much obleeged, and I'll try and do as much for you some time."

Wasn't a Bit Surprised.

The fox went his way with complacent look, and Uncle Reuben continued to grub and to think. When night came he did a little work about the coop, and just as he was winding up the clock and making ready to go to bed a great racket out there demanded his presence. He went out with the lantern in one hand and an ax helve in the other and wasn't a bit surprised to find reynard in one of the traps he had set.

"How, now, but is this the gratitude you show me for the pointer I gave you this afternoon?" exclaimed the fox as he tugged at his captive leg.

Moral.—"Waal, you see, it's this way," was the reply. "I got to thinking things over after you left and decided that it was jest as easy to set a trap for a fox as for a weasel, and that's how you come to put your foot in it."

"Then release me, and we'll call it a mistake."

"Oh, I can't do that, you see! I've got to foller out my logic and decide that it is jest as easy to knock a fox on the head as any other critter. Close your eyes and shet your teeth. It won't hurt but a minit."

A farmer who had lost several sheep at the hands of thieves notified the sheriff, and the latter individual set a watch and captured a man with the goods on him. When taken into court the evidence was so conclusive that speedy conviction resulted, and his honor was about to pass sentence when the prisoner rose up and said:

"Excuse me, judge, but I move to quash the proceedings."

"On what grounds, pray?"

"All the witnesses swore that I had a lamb on my shoulder when caught, while the warrant charges me with having stolen a sheep. I contend, your honor, that a sheep is not a lamb any more than a man is a boy."

The Prisoner's Sentence.

"Prisoner, the point is well taken. I was about to sentence you to state prison for one year for stealing a sheep. I will now amend the sentence to twelve months in the same institution for stealing a lamb."

"But it practically amounts to the same thing," protested the prisoner.

"That is true. But how many of us stop to define the difference between lamb and sheep when eating mutton chops? Remove the prisoner."

Moral.—The only difference between tweedledee and tweedledum is in the twiddle.

One day as the sage was sitting beneath a willow tree and meditating on man's inhumanity to man and how a cotton clothesline shrinks up after an August rainstorm he was approached by a fat, red faced man wearing an apron, who greeted him with:

"O sage, I am Green, the grocer."

"Yes, I have heard of green grocers several times before in my life," was the answer. "How is the green goods business coming on?"

"I know not, O wise man. This is my complaint: Some months since Brown, the hardware man, came to me and asked me to indorse his ninety day note."

"And you were ass enough to do it, of course?"

"He made a feeling appeal to me, O sage."

"Feeling nonsense! There is no feeling in business. When was the note due?"

"Only yesterday."

"And Brown couldn't pay it, and you had to, and now you have come whining around for some of my wisdom. Go to. I have none to give."

"But thou art mistaken, O sage. Brown had the sugar to pay the note and took it up."

"He did?"

"Truly he did. And I came not here to beg for thy wisdom."

"Then what brought thee?"

"To work the wisdom racket myself. My pointer is that when a man wants you to back his note don't chew straws over it. It's just a little business courtesy and prolific of the warm glow. Ta ta, old man."

Moral.—The unexpected is always happening. Wisconsin furnishes a case where a father gave up all his property to his children and they didn't turn him outdoors next day.

M. QUAD.

Fair Play.

An attache of the American embassy at London tells a story of a butler in the employ of a fine old English family whose long service had inculcated in him a personal proprietary interest in the sons and daughters of the house.

Once, on the occasion of a large dinner party, the conscientious butler observed that one of the members of the family, a young girl who had but recently entered society, was devoting an amount of attention to her agreeable neighbor on the right obviously in excess of that accorded to the less fascinating man on her left. This fact perturbed the butler to a degree that could no longer be borne in silence. So, under the pretense of passing the culprit a dish, the butler managed to whisper respectfully in her ear:

"A little more conversation to the left, miss."—Harper's Weekly.

His Weak Heart.

"He ran up two flights of stairs in his anxiety to propose to Miss Gilday and then couldn't speak because he was out of breath."

"What did she say?"

"She said, 'Faint heart ne'er won fair lady,' and turned him down."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

A Job For Him.

Police Inspector—Haven't I often instructed you that you are not to allow the public to pick the flowers in this park?

Park Keeper—Yes. That is my wife, who used to be your cook. Perhaps you will try to make her stop.—Meggendorfer Blatter.

Her Language.

"I am told that your wife speaks Greek and Latin?"

"No," answered Mr. Meekton; "she understands them, but I regret to say that she insists on using my own native tongue, so that there is no excuse for my not paying attention."—Washington Star.

In Many Places.

Mrs. Hiram Offen—Not much, but many, and when her week's up I propose to give her notice to hunt up another experience.—Philadelphia Press.

Flattering.

Magazine Editor—Why do you persist in coming in here? I tell you I don't buy fiction. The Lady Author—Oh, I don't wish to sell you any of my stories. I am writing a novel, entitled "The Ugliest Man on Earth," and I came in merely to obtain local color.

"Is that so? Well, I'll invest 15 cents toward a pool to exploit the proposition."—Washington Herald.

Advice to the Popper.

Do not pop on your knees
When the question you pop, sir.
If you do, all your life
On your knees you will stop, sir.

Do you love me?—not thus,
For an answer may fail her;
She may ask months to solve
All the doubts that assail her.

"Will you marry me?"—that's Going straight to the issue.
She'll reply "Yes!"—or "No!"
And so bless you or "dish" you.

America's New Relations to the World at Large

By CHARLES J. BONAPARTE, Attorney General of the United States and Ex-Secretary of the Navy

OUR detached and distant situation, in the words of Washington, which made us the friend and not the enemy of other nations, HAS CEASED TO BE. But, while we have drawn prodigiously nearer to possible and possibly dangerous enemies, we have also grown prodigiously bigger and richer and MORE OBTRUSIVE and, therefore, vastly more likely to awaken envy, distrust and fear, or, in other words, to have enemies. For us the days of obscurity and isolation are gone FOREVER, and safety must now be sought elsewhere.

It is not merely that Americans are twentyfold as many and a hundredfold—nay, far more than a hundredfold—as rich as they were when Washington sought rest at Mount Vernon, that their empire stretches from sea to sea on this continent and has spread to the Antilles and the isthmus, the jungles of Asia's islands and the snows of Alaska. Every morning brings to the breakfast table of each one of us a day's history of our fellow man of every race and in every clime. We cannot wholly shut our eyes TO AUGHT THAT GOES AMISS FOR HUMANITY throughout the world. We cannot wholly close our ears to any tale of wrongdoing, however distant or alien may be the sufferers, and despite ourselves the thought, half formed and half conscious, yet daily growing clearer to us and to others, forces itself upon our minds that in the vast and terrible drama of human destiny a nation such as ours has grown to be must have its allotted, ITS ENFORCED part to play.

If, then, we have lost, and lost beyond recovery, the security once afforded us by our remoteness, our insignificance and our isolation, if our "situation" is now neither "detached" nor "distant" and if the "primary interests" not of Europe only, but of the yet older continents, whereof Washington had no cause even to think, now bear to our affairs a "relation" far too intimate and weighty to let us seek safety IN IGNORING THEM, on what today would Washington, were he living and among us, bid us rely to preserve that peace which should be always the first and great end of our foreign policy and to protect our national safety AND HONOR?

Not, assuredly, on the good will, the magnanimity, the forbearance of other countries. Washington had and pretended to have none of those bald delusions as to human character and conduct which some dreamers in our midst caress and some DESIGNING MEN AFFECT TO SHARE.

I ask, then, of all thoughtful and patriotic citizens their aid to my successor in the great navy department of our federal government, but lately in my keeping, and to his colleague in the administration of the sister service and, most of all, to the commander in chief of our forces on land and sea under the constitution in assuring our country's peace BY MAINTAINING HER STRENGTH FOR WAR.

I ASK THAT THE NATION BE QUALIFIED FOR HONOR IN THE JUST JUDGMENT OF MANKIND BY GIVING HER SUCH STRENGTH AS MAY GAIN AND GUARD FOR HER THE PEACE OF RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Americans Are Too Prodigal

By JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER

CAN any one suppose that we Americans shall not be compelled ultimately to pay for the increasing extravagance of our people? It is the result of our unprecedented national prosperity, and it should be curbed. We are going ENTIRELY TOO FAST. We are too prodigal of our money. We do not keep our money at home. We are sending too much of our gold abroad. We are buying foreign novelties and letting our GOLD go to Europe. We are spending too much money.

THE MONEY OUGHT TO BE KEPT HERE IN THE UNITED STATES, FOR JUST AS SURELY AS WE SEND TOO MUCH OF OUR GOLD TO THE OTHER SIDE JUST SO SURELY WILL WE HAVE TO PAY THE PENALTY OF OUR RASHNESS.

We are using up our resources at a tremendous rate, but that is not our chief danger now. Our peril lies in our parting with the resources we have, and we are likely to find ourselves IN NEED IN THE FUTURE for this very reason. As to resources, think of the untold natural wealth of this country that has thus far not even been thought of, much less investigated.

But the trouble, I repeat, is that the people of the United States are entirely too prodigal of what they NOW have. They are taking advantage of a prosperity such as has never been excelled in this country to be both wasteful and extravagant.

WE ARE NOT SAVING UP FOR THE RAINY DAY—FOR THE TIME OF OUR NEED.

Effective Remedy For Corporate Wrongdoing

By HENRY CLEWS, New York Banker

HONEST captains of industry, associating themselves together for the establishment and conduct of a broad corporate enterprise, should be WELCOMED by the public. Yet the existing laws seem inadequate. It is due to the SOUND corporations of the country, as well as to the public, that something further should be provided to overcome the feeling of suspicion toward them and to keep the people informed as to their existing methods and the TRUE CONDITIONS of their affairs.

The remedy for corporation wrongdoing is found in PUBLICITY. This publicity is the great need of the day, and the public should demand it.

IN THE LIMELIGHT OF PUBLICITY THE IRREGULAR REBATE PRACTICES OF THE RAILWAYS FOR THE BENEFIT OF LARGE AND FAVORED SHIPPERS WOULD BE IMPOSSIBLE, AND EQUALLY SO WOULD HAVE BEEN THE GO AS YOU PLEASE AND EXTRAVAGANT MANAGEMENT OF THE LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES, AS REVEALED BY THE NEW YORK LEGISLATIVE INSURANCE INVESTIGATION.

SANTA CLAUS FOUND ON BOARD THE "THOMAS"

Mr. Charles E. Hoye Tells of the Children's Saint on Board Ship.

AT HONOLULU.

The Army Transport "Thomas" arrived in Honolulu harbor nine days out from San Francisco; she was several hours late owing to strong winds and heavy seas during part of the trip. This ship makes three hundred miles a day when conditions are favorable.

Before our arrival here we realized that we had exchanged the temperate zone for the torrid; blankets, which had felt so comfortable at night were discarded, and trunks were opened to get summer clothes.

We were soon alongside the naval dock and anxious to go ashore, but the rain was falling in torrents and many of the streets were flooded. While we were waiting for a clear sky the Army Transport "Sherman" from Manila via Japan came in and docked alongside our ship; cheers were exchanged by the passengers of the home bound and the outbound ships, as we looked across the rails for friends.

Later the big ship "Siberia" on its way from San Francisco to Japan and China, came in and docked near us; the "Siberia" left San Francisco several days after we sailed but being a much faster ship it overtook us here.

In the afternoon we visited the former king's palace, now the territorial capitol, the we rode thru the city and along the beach to the aquarium which is filled with a most wonderful collection of tropical salt water fish, from the ugly octopus to the bright little gold fish, all colors of the rainbow, all shapes, from the snake-like eel to the round jelly fish. In His wonderful creations on land and in the sea the God of all things reveals Himself.

Next day we rode up on the hill side, in an electric car, to the cemetery, where the kings of Hawaii and more humble folks are buried. As we stood before the marble tomb of the former monarchs we marveled that a kingdom was glad to become a simple territory of the American Union, with remote prospects of statehood.

The museum which shows the ancient life of the natives interested us, but perhaps the modern city itself was of most interest.

In these islands the traveler sees one of the most conglomerated masses of humanity; more Japanese than native Hawaiians and many more natives than Americans, with many Chinese and Europeans also, but the American influence both political and commercial fortunately predominates. There are miles of Japanese stores and hotels in Honolulu and thousands of the same people laboring on the big sugar plantations; Japan is not to be blamed if she covets these islands, as well as the Philippines but America will be foolish indeed if she ever surrenders either, thereby strengthening her most dangerous rival.

When we were at Honolulu rumor said that two regiments of Japanese soldiers had been landed as laborers, but this is unlikely. However, Japan has the material there for several regiments.

Nature has been kind to Honolulu, giving it a good harbor, pretty hillsides, a pleasant, tho warm climate, with plenty of rain and flowers all the year.

Man has not been slow to improve the gifts of Nature; the traveler sees pretty frame houses with well kept lawns, clean streets, substantial business houses and several large hotels.

In all these things Honolulu is far ahead of Manila, tho smaller; perhaps this difference is due to the fact that Honolulu is really American while Manila in architecture and enterprise is Maylay and Spanish.

At 3 p. m. of the second day of our stop we made our final purchases of beads and fragrant flower necklaces from the buxom Hawaiian girls at the dock, and steamed away to the west to-ward Guam.

Christmas Eve! The good ship "Thomas" of Uncle Sam's transport fleet, steaming bravely westward only two days from the little island of Guam. Christmas eve, but the passengers are perspiring, dressed in light cottons, all grateful for the light breeze that is blowing. Will Santa Claus, who comes with reindeer and snow be able to find us here in this tropic heat on the broad Pacific with nothing in sight except dark blue water and the sky above us like a mighty tent, all brightened by the half uncovered face of the moon? Oh, yes; wherever the fair haired Anglo-Saxon child may travel his Santa Claus will follow. Did we not see him a few days ago walking up and down the street in front of his big store in Honolulu, getting ready gifts for good boys and girls? Surely if he can come to Hawaii he can find us here near Guam.

Then there are so many children aboard. Why only the other day one of the ship's officers remarked that the "Thomas is becoming a regular family ship." Twenty-three children out of a total passenger list of 240; pretty good showing for a grim Army transport used primarily for the transportation of fighting men. Then almost all are such little tots, from six weeks to six years.

At 8.30 p. m. we assembled on the starboard deck facing a huge canvas, which, when lifted, revealed a young Hawaiian pine tree blazing with colored electric lights and loaded with Christmas gifts.

Then the children rendered a delightful entertainment of songs, recitations, and instrumental music, followed by the appearance of Santa Claus in a white dress with snow (cotton) in his hair; the smoke stack was too dirty for our Santa in white so he came down the riggings from the sky perhaps, and he carried a big bundle of gifts for us all, which with appropriate speeches he distributed; dolls, dishes, horses, wagons, little stockings filled with candy for the children, fans for the ladies and jumping jacks for the gentlemen. What a jolly Santa Claus and what happy children.

And so he found us on the broad ocean at nine o'clock on Christmas eve while you boys and girls in Maryland were just waking in the morning.

Christmas morning! The children play gaily on deck with their new toys, while the Merry Christmas to you passes around. At 10 a. m. divine services were held in the dining saloon under the direction of the chaplain of the 24th Infantry, and the afternoon was spent quietly in conversation and games and "good cheer."

Dinner at 7.30 p. m. satisfied good appetites: turkey, cranberry sauce, plum pudding, apples, nuts.

After dinner a funny entertainment was given by the soldiers aboard and a dance on deck, with ice cream and cake for refreshments, concluded our Merry Christmas celebration at sea.

AT GUAM.

Early in the evening of December 27th we sighted the little island of Guam, the largest of the Ladrone (robber) group, located about one thousand miles east of Manila; it is only thirty miles in length by ten in width, and but one tenth of the land is cultivated.

The population of the group is only about 10,000, tho it is said there were once 60,000 people there; but they proved very troublesome subjects to Spain, so "Butcher" Weyler, then Governor General of the Philippines, sent an army over to restore order and reduce the population.

Guam has a large natural harbor, protected on one side by the land and on the other by a long coral reef, but the entrance is dangerous and we were obliged to stand off the shore until morning, when we entered and proceeded to unload mail and supplies, including several kegs of beer for the Christmas celebration of the marines stationed there.

At 10-15 a. m. launches arrived to take us ashore and upon landing we found "bull carts" waiting to convey us to Agana, the capital, which is located five miles farther up the coast.

Our "bull" proved to be a cow, but she kept up a steady trot along one of the best and prettiest roads that the writer has ever seen; the cart was springless and cushionless but fortunately the road was as smooth as a floor and as hard as a rock; it is built of coral rock with a good ditch on each side, not a bit of dust; if you will add to this the shade of palm trees with occasional picturesque native houses, and the sea breaking into white foam over the coral reefs on one side and hills and cliffs on the other, you will have a pretty picture of the road to Agana.

The passengers of the "Thomas" were all invited to take lunch at the "palace" with the Governor, Commander Potts of the Navy, whose sister was also a passenger as far as Guam; so, after walking about the old town and climbing the hill to the old fort on top, we went to the palace, a cool, comfortable old house in the Spanish style, and were entertained by the hospitable Governor and his wife.

The return ride was no less delightful than that of the morning, our cow keeping up the pace of the "trotting bull" of India, and the rays of the noonday sun being tempered by the palm trees and sea breeze.

Arrived at the wharf again we paid our driver a dollar each for the round trip and at 4 p. m. the ship was headed toward Manila.

The natives people here are Malays and resemble the Filipinos closely, but speak a different dialect; our driver said he was a "Chamorro" and he spoke a little Spanish as well as his native tongue; their houses and customs are almost the same as those of their Filipino neighbors.

Perhaps some of you have not heard the story of our taking possession of these islands, so I will tell it briefly. In 1898 the Cruiser Charleston, when on its way to Manila stopped at Guam and sent a few shells in to let the Spanish know of its arrival. The Governor thought the Americans were saluting and sent a polite message saying he was sorry he could not reply as he had no powder. A detachment of marines were landed from the ship and the Governor was very much surprised to learn that war existed between the States and Spain and that he and his men were prisoners.

There is a cable station at Guam now and the people would know in a few minutes of any declaration of war and the Japanese would not have such an easy task to overcome the little garrison of American marines isolated in the Pacific.

C. E. HOYE.

At Sea, Dec. 28, 1906.

MANILA, P. I., Jan. 3, 1907.

My dear Mr. Sincell:

We arrived safely here on New Year's day, after a very pleasant voyage.

I have been assigned to my former station as supervising teacher of the Albay-Daraga district, postoffice, Legaspi, Albay Province, and we leave for that port tomorrow, a trip of 200 miles on a small steam ship.

Sincerely yours,

C. E. HOYE.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

There have been many things said recently in the journals of the country relative to the profession of teaching. Each of the articles are filled with inspiration and good will for the pedagog. Below are given a few extracts taken from some of the selections:

"It is unnecessary for me to say that every community owes more to its teachers than to almost any other set of men or women. The normal citizen is a father or mother, therefore the normal citizen must feel from the standpoint of interest those nearest and dearest to him or her, no less than from the standpoint of the State as a whole, the liveliest concern for the future generation, and it is the teachers who do more than any other set of their fellow-citizens to determine whether this future generation shall do well or ill.

"A life such as that which the town of Walpole proposes to celebrate represents an amount of usefulness to the community, as well as an amount of honorable service, richer than can be represented by any possible career spent wholly in moneymaking, no matter how successfully."—President Roosevelt in a letter to Mr. Plimpton, at Walpole, Mass., where a celebration was given on February 9th, in honor of a teacher who has taught in that town for over fifty years.

"The school is not now what it should be, mainly because the average public school teacher receives not quite the same yearly wage as the union hod carrier. But this soon is to be changed. * * * Provisions are being made for a more businesslike expenditure of funds. New ideas of education are coming into the school board.

"In one of the high schools (of Chicago) works a teacher who six years ago was an architect. He decided that it was a richer thing to build men than houses, and he has been teaching ever since. He tries to build useful, practical mechanics, who shall be useful, practical citizens as well. Already he has amply influenced hundreds of boys who must later, by their ballots, help to settle great, perplexing, vital questions,—who must help, by being practically faithful, to build a nation of real voters.

"In another part of the city is a woman teacher who has changed a school. At first she gave all her thought and energy to her single classroom. But then she began to feel that she, like every other teacher, had wider responsibilities. She believed that the school-room should be the center of the community. She began inviting her pupils to little parties of her own in the afternoons, in the evenings, on Saturdays. The room became a place not only for work, but for games and tableaux and sewing, and stories—stories that somehow gave big, now ideas about one's duty to the city and the nation, ideas to be talked over at night with parents. As the parents began wishing to know this delightful person, in a year she was a friend in most of the homes. All this reacted on the actual school work. Her children did more.

"Then she called a meeting of all the teachers, and now the whole spirit of teaching in that school has been widened and enriched. And in many other schools are like beginnings.

"The school outlook is the brightest, clearest, cheeriest prospect in America."—Extracts from an article by Ernest Poole in The Outlook.

"The reputation of the people of the United States at home and abroad is that they esteem education highly. But if we judge by the wages paid to teachers, this reputation is not deserved. When the annual wage of the public dogcatcher in the capital of the United States is two or three times as great as that of the average public-school teacher we have a right to assume that dogcatching as a profession is more highly esteemed there than teaching as a profession. The Educational Review has an article comparing the earnings of a public school teacher with those of men engaged in mechanical and unskilled labor. In 64 American cities the average wage of all schoolteachers, including the superintendents, is $300 a year, or 95 cents a working day. In the same cities bricklayers get from $5 to $5.50 a day and hodcarriers from $2 to $2.25. In Pennsylvania many of the public school teachers receive less than the pensions given to the paupers. In every city of the United States except four, the Educational Review declares the minimum salary paid to street-sweepers exceeds the minimum salary paid to public-school teachers. In Chicago the minimum pay of ironmolders is $900 a year and the minimum pay of the molders of character is $550 a year. In Seattle the ironmolder gets $1,050 and the teacher $550. In Maryland the Legislature had to impose a penalty upon the counties in the way of witholding State aid, in order to raise the minimum salaries of the teachers to the munificent sum of $300 a year. One reason why teachers are so poorly paid is that most of them are women, and have no votes and no unions with which to protect themselves."—Editorial in the Baltimore Sun, on February 6, 1907.

It might be added that the average salary to teachers in Garrett county last year was $29.98 per month.

THE TEACHER AND THE SCHOOL.

"* * * Beyond doubt the greatest thing a teacher can do for a pupil is to teach the latter how to study. Information imparted is soon forgotten, but habits of industry and study remain and grow. Therefore, don't neglect to take up a new lesson with pupils occasionally, and show them how to see what there is in it. Such action on the part of the teacher carries with it a nicety of discrimination and an ordering power that brings independent mastery.

"The study period is just as important as the recitation. As a rule the former should be as far removed from the latter as possible—a lesson is supposed to be prepared for eternity and not for the recitation period.

Special emphasis is laid upon written work. To be of value every paper handed in should be carefully looked over, and corrections and suggestions for improvement made. Written recitations should not be announced before hand as a rule: it is a part of education to learn to meet the conditions that confront us, and in actual life such conditions are seldom posted in advance.

"The following purposes that written work will serve are mentioned. (1) It should enable the teacher to examine the pupils and himself at the same time. (2) It should aid the pupil in thinking. (3) It should aid the pupil in the expression of correct English. (4) It should reveal to the pupil his mastery of the points of the question. (5) It should make the pupil more self-reliant. (6) It should aid the teacher to do more work in the school-room."—From the February issue of The Circle.

WHO IS THE BACKBONE OF THE SCHOOL?

The last article of this series will have to be deferred until next week, as all the space allotted to this department has been filled with the articles given above. Each of those above was written by capable writers and they should be of much value to the teachers of Garrett county.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,

Notice of Condemnation Proceedings.

No. 136 Miscellaneous Docket. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The County Commissioners of Garrett County v. Joseph M. Crim, Edward Crim and Mattie Crim his wife, Calvin Crim and Clara Crim his wife, William Crim and Annie Crim his wife, George Crim and Nellie Crim his wife, Ida Crim and E. J. Crim her husband, Minnie Menhorn and John Menhorn her husband, Fannie Nogle and Daniel Nogle her husband, Elizabeth Crim, William R. Offutt and J. C. Renninger, Trustees; George D. white and Alfred G. Sturgiss.

To Edward Crim and Mattie Crim his wife, Calvin Crim and Clara Crim his wife, William Crim and Annie Crim his wife, George Crim and Nellie Crim his wife, Ida Crim and E. J. Crim her husband, Fannie Nogle and Daniel Nogle her husband, and Elizabeth Crim, owners of Lot No. 44 in the town of Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland, and hereinafter particularly described.

You are hereby notified that the County Commissioners for Garrett County have applied to the Honorable Robert R. Henderson, one of the Judges for the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland, for a warrant to be directed to the Sheriff of said Garrett County requiring him to summon a jury to condemn the property hereinafter mentioned and described, and that in accordance with said application the said warrant was on the fourth day of February, 1907, directed to the said Sheriff as will fully appear in said proceedings the same being No. 136 Miscellaneous in the Circuit Caurt for Garrett County; and you are hereby notified that on the twenty third day of February 1907, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. an inquisition will be held on the land and premises hereinafter particularly described in the town of Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland, at the suit of the County Commissioners for Garrett County against you and others to condemn a certain piece or parcel of ground and the improvements and material thereon as is necessary for the use and occupation in perpetuity of said County Commissioners for the following public purposes, to-wit: for the erection thereon of a new court house building for Garrett County, for grounds for the same, and for the use of conveying the prisoners from the County jail over and through said lot to the said court house, and for the purpose of running steam, water and sewerage pipes through said lot from the said proposed court house to the said jail for the purposes thereof; and for sufficient grounds and way from said court house to said jail for a walk to said jail way, and for other necessary purposes set forth in said petition; and that upon said inquisition at said time and place a jury of said county summoned by the Sheriff of said county will find whether or not the condemnation of such land, buildings or materials is necessary and proper for the use of said county for the due exercise and enjoyment of its corporate privileges as hereinbefore set forth; and will justly and impartially value the damages which you and the other owners will sustain by reason of the use and occupancy of said land, buildings and materials, in perpetuity. The said County Commissioners having been unable to agree with Joseph M. Crim, one of the said owners, upon the purchase price of said property, and that you are nonresidents of Garrett county, Md., in which said land so wanted lies.

Said land so wanted and to be condemned is described as follows, to-wit: Being all that lot of ground in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, and known and designated as Lot No. 44 in said town as shown on the plat filed by McCarty and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 2, folio 513, one of the Land Records of said Garrett county, Maryland, beginning for the same at the first line of Lot No. 40 on said plat, and running thence South 67 degrees East 5 perches, North 23 degrees East 8 perches, North 67 degrees West 5 perches, and then by a straight line to the beginning, containing ¼ of an acre more or less. This being the same property described in a deed from John M. Davis et al., Trustees, to Mary Jane Crim dated the 5th day of May, 1877, and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 3, folio 223, &c, one of the Land Records of Garrett county, Maryland.

That the said lot is necessary and proper to be condemned for the use of said county for the public purposes as aforesaid, and is necessary and proper as well as each and every part of said lot for the use of said court house, jail, grounds and the purposes aforesaid.

You are therefore notified that said inquisition will be held at the aforesaid time and place for the purposes aforesaid and to be present if you see fit, in person or by attorney, and to take such action in the premises as you may be advised or may see proper.

PETER J. STEPHENS,
A. CLYDE SMITH,
ASA B. FRIEND,
The County Commissioners of Garrett County, Maryland.

BILL FOR RECEIVER FOR PENN-GARRETT COAL CO.

Paper Alleges Indebtedness to Various Persons for Large Amount.

In the Circuit Court for Garrett county a bill was filed one day this week for the appointment of a receiver for the Penn-Garrett Coal Company of Garrett county, which corporation was formed under a special act of the recent session of the Maryland Legislature to mine and market coal, erect, equip and operate tramways and railroads and generall to engage in the coal business as miners and shippers.

Under the Act of the Assembly the corporation was formed and at once begun active business for which it was chartered, being possessed of a large body of coal land located in Election District No. 2, the main opening into the body of coal being made at or near Kendall A large hotel and some twenty or thirty double houses for the miners engaged in operating the mines were erected on land adjoining the company's works, bonds to a large amount were issued and sold to parties in Garrett county and adjoining counties of Pennsylvania.

The bill was filed by Mr. G. S. Hamil at the instance of the Kendall Lumber Company, F. G. Fox, Charles A. Mitchell and others residing at Friendsville, alleging indebtedness amounting to nearly $6,000,

Associate Judge Henderson has entered an order against the defendant company to show cause why a receiver should not be appointed as prayed.

Yesterday it was understood that the indebtedness would be paid off within a few days and the petition for a receiver withdrawn and the mines will be kept in operation.

The company has quite a number of men at work and is shipping the output to eastern markets as fast as the coal can be dug and loaded.

Hints For Quitters.

John Wanamaker says: "If there is one enterprise on earth that a 'quitter' should leave severely alone, it is advertising. To make a success of advertising one must be prepared to stick like a barnacle on a boat's bottom. He should know before he begins it that he must spend money—lots of it. Somebody must tell him also that he cannot hope to reap results commensurate with his expenditure early in the game. Advestising doesn't jerk; it pulls. It begins very gently at first, but the pull is steady. It increases day by day and year by year until it exerts an irresistible power."—American Telephone Journal.

LEG ALMOST ENTIRELY TORN OFF BY MILL MACHINERY.

Serious Accident Which Befell Mr. Joseph Rembold Tuesday Morning.

Last Tuesday morning a serious and extremely painful accident befell Mr. Joseph Rembold, a well known farmer and saw mill man residing over in Preston county, a few miles across the State line, which will probably leave Mr. Rembold a cripple for the balance of his natural life.

The injured man was assisting in the operation of his mill when he noticed a belt slipping from a rapidly revolving pulley near the floor of the mill and without thinking of the consequences that would probably follow his act he raised his foot and attempted to kick the belt into place. Overreaching his aim his foot was caught by the belt and in a twinkling his leg was drawn in and crushed between the pulley and the belt in a horrible manner, producing a compound fracture of the limb and severing the muscles and flesh so that the lower portion of his leg hung by a few shreds.

Dr. McComas, of Oakland, was called in consultation by Dr. Gilbert Selby, of Eglon, who dressed Mr. Rembold's injuries, the ultimate outcome of which is not yet determined by the surgeons, as they may yet result in an amputation of the injured leg.

Letter to H. C. Sinceli.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: It is a great thing for a merchant to have the exclusive sale (in his region, of course) of anything wanted by everybody.

There are two ways to treat such goods. One is: put the price up and make big profit. The other way is: be fair and make more.

Devoe is the paint that takes least gallons and costs least money a house, a job, a year, a lifetime—no matter how you reckon your costs, except by the gallon—Devoe is the best care-taker and costs least money.

Don't forget that the principal part of the cost of paint is putting it on. Less gallons, less cost. Don't forget that another principal part of economy is long wear; less gallons, less cost and long wear.

It is a great thing to have the exclusive sale of popular goods, of goods that make friends, of goods that enrich both buyer and seller. Devoe is perhaps only ten per cent better than one or two others; but ten is a plenty—it's 200 or 300 better than many.

There's many a merchant who hasn't found out his goods. It doesn't take a man long to find out that Devoe is the least-money paint and why, no matter which side he is on.

Yours truly,

THE HONORABLE IRA CULP AGAIN AT THE FRONT.

Late Socialistic Candidate Wants Teachers to Join F. Of L.

Prof. Ira Culp, a former resident and public school teacher of Garrett county, who was the Socialistic candidate for Congress last fall, is again before the public eye.

Prof. Culp's present occupation is that of principal of the Vale Summit (Allegany county) public school. At the mid-winter meeting of the Allegany County Teachers' Association held at the State Normal School, Frostburg, on Friday last, Prof. Culp offered a resolution to the effect that the Allegany County Teachers' Association affiliate itself with the American Federation of Labor. The resolution was seconded by another member of the Association.

In support of his motion Prof. Culp made a vigorous speech along Socialistic lines. When asked by a fellow teacher if in the event the association affiliated with the Federation would the teachers be called out in a sympathetic strike, Prof. Culp answered "No." The resolution was voted down.

AN OLD-TIME HYMN.

Words That Were Sung in the Days of Our Forefathers.

The following lines, based on the experience of Rev. Jas. Sanson, were written by Dr. Wm. Hunter, after hearing the experience related in a testimony meeting at a session of the Pittsburg Conference.

There is a spot to me more dear
Than native vale or mountain,
A spot for which affection's tears,
Springs grateful from its fountain;
'Tis not where kindred souls abound,
Though that were almost heaven;
But where I first my Saviour found,
And felt my sins forgiven.

Hard was my toil to reach the shore,
Long tossed upon the ocean:
Above me was the thunder's roar,
Beneath the waves commotion.
Darkly the pall of night was thrown
Around me faint with terror;
In that dark hour how did my groan
Ascend for years of error.

Sinking and panting as for breath,
I knew not hope was near me;
I cried, O, save me, Lord, from death,
Immortal Jesus, hear me!
Then quick as thought I felt Him mine;
My Saviour stood before me:
I saw His brightness round me shine,
And shouted glory, glory.

O sacred hour, O hallowed spot,
Where love divine first found me,
Wherever falls my distant lot,
My heart will linger round thee;
And when from earth I rise to soar
Up to my home in heaven,
Down will I cast my eyes once more
Where I was first forgiven.

I knew Rev. Jas. G. Sanson, who was Presiding Elder in the Pittsburg Conference, a man of extraordinary powers in the pulpit and the best natural orator I ever heard. Dr. Wm. Hunter, who composed the above lines, was one of my teachers when a student at Allegheny College, Pa.

A Preston Road Experiment.

Hon. William G. Brown, familiarly known as Junior Brown, has been appointed road overseer on the highway between Kingwood and Albright in Preston county. It is to be hoped that this was not done as a joke, and that Mr. Brown will not consider it as a joke. He is supposed to be the wealthiest man in Preston county, and he is a very busy man. But he can afford to do the work assigned to him. He can set an example that will be worth a great deal. He can see to it that every man called on the road to work, works. He can see that every cent for that road goes on in the right way, and is not dumped in the mudholes as nine-tenths of road money usually is. Mr. Brown will no doubt recall a story from Greek history. One of the great men of Athens was ordered to clean the streets. It was meant to be a humiliation; but he turned it into an honor by making the streets so much cleaner than they had ever been before that every ambitious man wanted the job of street cleaning. Mr. Brown's appointment may have been intended as a joke, but he can make it a serious matter by showing how to make every cent and every lick of work count, if he can stop the waste on his three miles of road, others will model after him. He will not need spent any of his own money and yet can do what a poor man cannot do.—Morgantown Chronicle.

TRUMAN ROOT STABBED TO DEATH NEAR FIRENOSVILLE.

John Brown, a Swede. Is In Jail Charged With the Crime.

A murder, surrounded by mysterious circumstances, was committed at a house located a few miles south of Friendsville, in Election District No. 2, last Thursday evening about nine o'clock, the victim being Truman Root, aged about forty-five years, the father of a family of six children, who resided on a farm near the place where he lost his life,

John Brown, a Swede, also married, but with no children, is in jail charged with committing the crime.

From information which is considered entirely reliable, THE REPUBLICAN has learned the following in connection with the matter: Root and Brown, who are neighbors, and who were boon companions for a number of years, were in Friendsville on Thursday and about dark started homeward, both of them somewhat under the influence of liquor. At the home of Oscar Friend, located about three miles from Friendsville the two men stopped and went into the house, where it is said, they became involved in a quarrel, when Brown attacked Root with a knife, cutting at him several times, one wound being inflicted in his left urm, the fatal thrust being in Root's neck which severed the jugular vein, death ensuing almost instantly.

The Friend woman went to the house of a neighbor and telephoned to Friendsville and in a short time two or three men arrived when they found Root sitting on the edge of a bed with his head resting in his hand, apparently uninjured, but an effort to arouse him brought no response, when it was found that he was dead.

A coronor's jury was summoned by Justice Hardie of Friendsville which brought in a verdict that Root had come to his death at the hands of Brown, who was taken into custody the following morning, being arrested at his home by Constable Johnson and brought to Oakland on Friday.

The Friend woman was held as a witness and being unable to fill the required bond for her appearance before the grand jury she was also brought to jail on Monday.

Mrs. Friend is the wife of Oscar Friend, who was committed to Springfield Asylum last fall by the Court, the man having lost his reason owing, it is alleged, to the bad habits of his wife.

BITTINGER.

Henry Stark died at his home about four miles east of this village on last Sunday evening at the advanced age of about seventy-five years. The deceased has been a sufferer for about three years and his demise has been expected for some days past. The survivors are Messrs. John and James S. Stark, Mrs. Michael Legeer and Mrs. Wesley Hare, all residents of this district. Rev. Mr. Young of Salisbury, Pa., was called to preach the funeral sermon on Tuesday morning.

Gustavus Stanton was marketing apples in Swanton last Saturday and reports prices rather slow.

John L. Beachy is home this week getting out saw logs preparatory to having lumber cut for the erection of a new barn on his farm the coming spring.

Messrs. Manassa and Lloyd Brenneman are moving their saw mill from here to Hileman's Ridge, where they have several contracts.

W. L. Thomas, instructor in our public school, was at his home at Fike Md., last Saturday and Sunday.

Henry Bittinger and family, of Jennings, Md., were visiting Mrs. Bittinger's parents, Mr. and Mrs. John Stark, last Saturday and Sunday.

The oyster supper given by the good ladies of the Lutheran church, in this village last week, was a satisfactory success in every way.

There are some preparations being made in this section to begin sugar making as soon as a break occurs in the weather.

Free Garden Seeds.

We have received from the Agricultural Department at Washington for free distribution among our patrons, a consignment of garden seeds which will be sent or given to those applying for same. In no event will the seeds be given to children, except upon written request from their parents.

FREIGHT BRAKEMAN KILLED AT ALTAMONT FRIDAY MORNING.

W. H. Messenger Ground to Pieces Under Wheels of His Train.

W. H. Messenger, aged 33 years, residing at Grafton with his family consisting of his wife and three small children was killed at Altamont, the head of the Seventeen Mile grade, on last Saturday morning.

The dead man was employed as a brakeman on an eastbound freight train and just as it was leaving Altamont a strange noise was heard under the wheels of the caboose by the conductor of the train, who signalled to the engineer to stop. Going back on the track the horribly mutilated remains of Messenger were discovered by his fellow-trainmen, the head and one arm being severed and the body cut in two. The trainmen gathered the remains as well as they could and took them on to Cumberland, and later they were sent to Grafton where the funeral took place on Sunday.

The deceased was a son of John Messenger, who was killed about twenty-five years ago near the same spot and in a similar manner.

HOYES.

The little daughter of Rev. Hudson is still seriously ill. Dr. Boyer is the attending physician.

Mr. and Mrs. William Callis drove over to Farmington, Pa., Friday last and returned Sunday evening. While there they visited Mr. Callis' sister, Mrs. Montague, who has been quite ill for some time past.

Mr. Robert Cook is shaking hands with his relatives and many friends in this community. He is a nephew of Messrs. A. C. and John DeWitt, also a former resident of this neighborhood. He was called to the east by the death of his mother, and is now located in northern Nebraska. It has been twenty-five years since he left this country, and by his untiring energy and industry he has accumulated much wealth, being the owner of a valuable ranch in Nebraska and a fine dwelling in Alliance, Ohio. He expects to return to his home in a short time.

Miss Freda DeWitt and little brother Whitfield spent last Sunday with Misses Sadie and Rosa Wilburn.

Miss Bernadette Mattingiy was one of the number of young ladies in Hoyes who was sleigh riding Sunday evening.

Mr. Earl Smith and sister Auburn were guests of Miss Bertha and Arthur Custer last Sunday.

The little child of Mr. D. O. DeWitt's has almost recovered from scarlet fever, and so far no other member of the family has taken the disease.

SPECIAL MEETINGS FOR THE MEN AND WOMEN

For the Latter Services Will Be Held Friday and on Sunday for the Men.

Interest in the revival being conducted in St. Paul's M. E. church in Oakland is still manifested by the increased attendance at each succeeding service and the conversion of from three to six or eight persons nightly.

So far during the revival ninety-three persons have professed conversion, among the number being children of tender years, youths and maidens just budding into manhood and womanhood, young men and young ladies, middle aged men and woman and some beyond the meridian of life. With the impetus given the meeting on Tuesday night when several of the young men of town were converted the far reaching influence of the revival cannot be judged and the length of time the meetings will be continued into the future is but a matter of speculation. It is the determination of Pastor Workman and his corps of workers to continue the meeting just as long as there is any possibility of accomplishing good.

Two special meetings have been arranged for, both of which will be addressed by Dr. W. W. Davis, who will arrive here today or tomorrow from Baltimore. On Friday afternoon at 2.30 o'clock a meeting for the ladies and girls only will be conducted, to be addressed by Dr. Davis, his subject being "The Responsibility of the Women of Oakland," at which every lady is cordially invited to be present.

On Sunday afternoon at 3.30 o'clock a meeting for men and boys will be held, when the same speaker will make an address, his subject being "The King Within—What Shall I Do With Him?" Every man and boy in Oakland and the surrounding country should endeavor to attend this meeting.

Special music will be rendered at each of these services and large congregations are expected to attend.

At the Sunday morning services in the church a class of probations will be addressed by Rev. J. M. Davis.

Taken to the Asylum.

Frederick Gensenyager, for many years a resident of Deer Park district, was taken to Springfield Asylum, Sykesville, by Sheriff Albert L. Lee on last Thursday night. Mr. Gensenyager had become a county charge and was committed to the asylum by the County Commissioners after an examination as to his sanity had been made by physicians, their opinion being that he was insane and required treatment. He is eighty-three years of age.

God's Covenant With Abram.

Nomadic life has always its own strong attraction. But the story of the migrations of this first of pilgrim fathers has a fascination peculiar to itself. Before the eye of imagination his caravan seems to pass. There goes the venerable sheik, clad in his crimson robe, wearing his silken turban with its fillet of rope. His "princess," in all her Oriental finery, rides beside him. There are the armed scouts on fleet horses; the noisy herdsmen, urging on the flocks and droves; the women and children, a thousand souls and more; and the long train of beasts of burden, carrying the impedimenta of a great camp.

They pass by Damascus, the superb, and leave the snowy heights of Hermon and Lebanon to their right, and the Sea of Chinereth to the left, and pause at the oak-grove of Moreh in Shechem, while Ebal Gerizim look down at them. On they move through the lovely plains of Esdrelon, strewn with its roses of Sharon in patterns more beautiful than any Brussels, down into the rich Jordan Valley, under the beetling crags of Gilgal, up Salem's steeps, on to holy Hebron and Adullam's weird cave,—through the whole land, from Dan to Beersheba, they wander as fancy takes them, or the necessities of their flocks and herds require.

But the sacred character of the pilgrims and the pilgrimage is never lost sight of. Abram is priest as well as king of his tribe. The caravan never halts without an altar being upreared. The idol-worshiping Canaanites look on curiously as the smoke curls up before an invisible God. Abram's whole retinue understands and shares his high hope and purpose. The morning and evening sacrifice keeps them constantly in mind of it.

Abram's noble generosity has marked exemplification in his dealing with Lot. His tact and prowess shine in his pursuit of the four kings and rescue of his nephew, his magnanimity in his refusal to take a thread or shoe-latchet from the spoil. There are two blots on the escutcheon of this high-minded patriarchal prince,—His timorous duplicity in Egypt concerning his wife; again, his over-haste and use of human expedients to fulfill God's promise in the taking of Hagar to wife. But these are mere specks upon an effulgent disk. Abram was twenty centuries beyond his day in character and in manner of life.

God disciplined His servant for these lapses,—in the first instance, by a rebuke from the lips of a heathen monarch; in the second, by withholding from him for thirteen years any visible manifestation of Himself. But at length this long period of correction ended with the sudden outbursting of the glory of the shekinah upon his dreary path.

There is a significant change of name ordered in the case of each party concerned in the covenant. The Deity Himself condescends to follow the custom of man and at this juncture give Himself a new and significant name; namely, El Shaddai—the All-sufficient God. Abram's name is changed from Exalted Father to Abraham, Father of Nations. Sarai, my princess, to Sarah universal. This change of name was a devise of the eldest times, when means of intercommunication and record were scarce, to arrest attention and fix in memory important events and changes of circumstance. By this means it was advertised to Abram's motley clan, and the surrounding tribes as well, that this aged sheik should miraculously beget a son by his own and venerable wife, from whom in turn should spring noisy masses and tumultuous nations.

The pledge of this incredible circumstances was the new name of the Deity. He was "sufficient" for this thing. "I am the Almighty God." On that golden hook Abraham could hang his faith. And he did! He fell on his face, in that very act of adoring worship, appropriating the promise in all its fullness. In the injunctions, "Walk before Me!" and "Be perfect!" the is gentle hint of the times when Abraham had failed to see the Invisible, and had stooped to ignoble devices to ward off imaginary dangers.

This is no new covenant, but the happy assurance that Almighty God is rising to set in motion toward their blessed consummation the contents of the covenant, the first elements of which were given at least thirty years before in Ur of the Chaldees.

Analysis and Key.

1. Nomadic life. Its attraction.
   Abraham's journey through Canaan.
   Its sacred character: Sign of it.
2. Abraham's generosity with Lot.
3. Abraham's lapses: their punishment.
4. The Covenant.
   Change of name in contracting parties.
   Promise of descendents.
   Pledge of it.

The Teacher's Lantern.

What a bugaboo perfection is to many people. Yet twenty centuries before Christ, God commanded Abraham to be perfect, and Jesus, with this very command apparently in mind, directs His disciples to be perfect even as their Father is perfect. Yet many seem to pride themselves upon their imperfection, to even boast of it. He magnifies the grace of God most who lets it work to the uttermost in his heart.

* * * * *

El Shaddai should be the mystic talisman, the broad phylantery bound upon our foreheads. God's almightiness ought to stir our feeble faith, make us realize the promises, however exceeding great they are.

* * * * *

Saved from many a snare would we be if we only walked before the Lord, conscious that His eye was on us from above. "Thou God seest me." The Lord said, "Walk before Me." The thought of a continued purpose inheres in the Word—set thyself, be firmly purposed, thoroughly determined to obey before Me. God and His Church need such today.

* * * * *

Frederick W. Robertson, in his charming sermon, "The Illusiveness of Life," flatly denies that God fulfilled His promise to give Canaan to Abraham and his descendents. He goes further to say that He never intended to fulfill it. He could only beguile a gross Israel from the flesh-pots of Egypt by offering them something of the same sort—a land flowing with milk and honey. If He had told them that the "rest remaining for the people of God" was only inward and spiritual, and the promised land was the Jerusalem above, they would never have budged. So God offered one thing, but gave another—compensated for His failure by bestowing something greater.

* * * * *

Dangerous and excessive spiritualizing, this. We all recognize God's educative processes with His ancient people, and their steady advance in the apprehension of spiritual truth. But we resent the idea of any double entente in the Divine method. Here was a solemn covenant, the explicit terms of which were attested by an oath and sealed with a sign. Robertson does not prove that the covenant was not literally fulfilled. If it was not fulfilled, I would rather believe, as many do, that God will yet make good His promise by giving Palestine to the Jews, than to believe He never intended to give it to him.

* * * * *

Truth is literal and spiritual run side by side in the history of God's favored people. Abraham is literally a father of nations—Arabia, Midian, Ammon, Moab, as well as Israel. But he is also the Spiritual Father of the nations that are now being born in a day by the preaching of the Gospel. Kings Kings are his offspring—David Sololmon, literally; all believers, spiritually, who are made "kings unto God." His descendants are literally and phenomenally numerous, but his spiritual descendents are already numbered by the hundreds of millions.

HEART of GOLD

A St. Valentine's Day Story
By HOWARD FIELDING.

Copyright, 1906, by Charles W. Hooke.

I PAUSED outside the door of Austen's studio and fixed a dollar bill so that a corner of it would stick out of my waistcoat pocket. There was no use asking him whether he needed money. He would always repel the insinuation, even when he hadn't had any luncheon and was fierce eyed with hunger. Neither could he be caught by an open display of coin or bills, but if a bit of money was in sight and Austen didn't know that the owner thereof was aware of it he would betray his need by occasional glances full of gentle and pathetic longing.

Let me hasten to say that Austen was not a failure in the ordinary, old fashioned way. He used to make a good living from illustrations, cover designs and the better kind of potboiling in general, but he had a serious illness, and while he lay unconscious some of his friends became overanxious and called in too much medical talent. In the present state of the world Austen might better have died, perhaps, than have contracted such a heavy debt. He paid it and hadn't a penny with which to begin work.

Conditions have changed in the last ten or fifteen years, and capital is essential to the artist. Life presses him so hard that he can't both work and live unless he has money in the bank or enjoys some form of special favor from those who have. Otherwise he will be like a swimmer in an undertow—the best that he can hope for is to keep his nose above water.

When I entered the studio, Austen was admiring the last fruit of his own toil. It was a little thing in oil, a girl looking at a shield which bore a device of a heart of gold and a scroll in which one could discover the date Feb. 14.

I took it to be a cover design for a February issue of a magazine or for some special purpose incident to St. Valentine's day, and I deplored the waste of time. It was then the tenth day of the shortest month, and this thing could not be used by anybody until next year.

"What do you think of it?" he asked.

"It's a beauty," I replied. "You'll sell it—if you live."

"No, I won't," said he, with decision. "I didn't make it to sell."

My mouth was open to reply that he shouldn't make anything for any other purpose when the picture itself checked me. A flash of memory illumined my understanding.

"Isn't that the girl—I saw her only once—the girl who"—

"Yes," said he, interrupting. "It is the girl who makes all other girls look like—like the crude and meaningless objects which I usually draw when I try to draw girls. But this is different, isn't it?"

"My boy, you are right," said I. "This is the only genuine, and all others are base imitations. What are you going to do with it?"

"I shall commit the gross absurdity of sending it to her as a valentine," said he. "Wish I could afford a frame, but I can't. The express charges will wind me up. In fact"— His eye at that moment lighted upon the green bait protruding from my waistcoat pocket, and he gave a little gasp as a man sometimes will when his stomach is empty.

"However," he continued, "she won't be bound to go to the expense of framing it. She can ask the butler to set it in the back cellar just as it is and know that my feelings are safe, because I shall never find out what becomes of it."

AUSTEN WAS ADMIRING THE LAST FRUIT OF HIS TOIL.

"Isn't she in the city?"

"No," said he. "I guess the family will live in Morristown all winter unless they go abroad. I've been asked to go out, but I haven't any clothes, and the round trip costs $1.20. The chances are, old man, that I shall never see her again, and so I thought I'd better paint this portrait from memory right now. I'm in danger of forgetting her," he added, with a mournful smile.

On the contrary, it had been my opinion that Austen was very greatly in danger of not forgetting her. She was, to all intents and purposes, an inhabitant of another planet, and it was extremely unfortunate that he had ever met her. These accidents are less frequent than they used to be, but we are still imperfectly civilized, and there are parts of the golden wall which a poor man can see over. Austen was both susceptible and constant and likely to have trouble enough without adding a hopeless love.

I did not then know that Miss Copeland had any considerable sum of money in her own right or any expectations beyond the share in her father's estate which would eventually fall to her, which, unless I misjudged Mr. Copeland, would not be liberal if his daughter should marry a poor man and might be nothing at all. The true state of the young lady's finances has since become known to me, and I am willing to admit that my conduct toward Austen was not calculated to subserve his best worldly interests.

In short, to drop the style of envious sureness which we who live in cities

"I'M GLAD YOU PUT ME ON TO THIS," HE SAID.

now adopt when we speak of the rich, I honestly thought that it would be a double error for Austen to send this remarkable valentine to Miss Copeland. In the first place, he couldn't afford to do so, for the picture was amazingly good, and, with a slight suppression of the likeness, would certainly be salable some time. In the second place, it could not fail to evoke an answer from Miss Copeland and thus revive an acquaintance which could only result in pain and disappointment to my friend.

"Billy," said I, "you mustn't commit this folly. Here's the best thing you have ever done, and you ought to work it so that you can set yourself on your feet again."

"Yes?" said he. "How hard do you suppose the express company will swat me to take this out to Morristown?" And again he eyed the corner of my dollar.

I argued the case with him, but I might as well have addressed my remarks to the jointed dummy of wood which he used as a model. The best I could do was to persuade him to hold the picture two or three days before sending it. He had intended to ship it right away, in fear lest the landlord might do something disagreeable in the way of padlocking the door or otherwise attempting to collect the rent by violence.

I lent Austen the dollar, and while he was holding it in his hand and contemplating it with a trance-like stare I deftly picked the inside breast pocket of his waistcoat, which he had fastened to the bookcase with a thumb tack. From this pocket I drew an envelope containing all that was left of Austen's pawnable possessions, and I succeeded in getting the ticket for a fine suit of clothes which he had bought just before his illness. Then, having restored the envelope with the remainder of its contents, I departed hastily.

After visiting the pawnbroker's and a little tailor's shop I called upon the art editor of one of our leading magazines, and, having justified my visit by some rather neat lying, I said to him:

"Who's buying Harry Austen's stuff now?"

"Didn't know anybody was," he replied.

"You want to wake up," said I. "He has caught on."

"How do you mean?" said he.

"He's been doing some swell stuff," I replied, "and it isn't for sale. When I was in his studio this afternoon there was a man trying to induce him to sell a cover design—splendid thing it was, too—and Austen wouldn't let go."

"Did he say it was ordered?"

"No," said I. "He could sell it, but he won't. He's feeling pretty sure of himself these days. I shouldn't be surprised if your friends across the square were stocking up with some of his work."

"Tell him to come down here and see me," said the editor.

"He won't," said I. "He's got something else on his mind."

The editor drummed on his table and whistled softly. I was afraid to say a word more and instantly took my departure.

I went across the square to those "friends" of the editor's whom I had mentioned to him. There I found, of course, another magazine's art editor, and to him I told the same tale. Then I met a good fellow on the street who knew Austen, and I prevailed upon him to carry my story into two other publishing houses.

About lunchtime the next day I went to the building where Austen has his studio and nearly ran into my friend and art-editor No. 1. They were going out to luncheon together on the A. E.'s treat, which he would subsequently work into an expensive bill. I dodged behind the elevator shaft and then followed cautiously. When I had trailed them to a restaurant, I ran over to get art editor No. 2 and brought him to that same chophouse.

"By jingo!" I whispered as we came in. "That accounts for it."

He looked across to where Austen and art editor No. 1 were sitting, and then he drew a long breath.

"I'm glad you put me on to this," he said. "Austen must be right in it. This is the first time in a year that I've seen him with his trousers pressed." I blessed myself for my visit to the pawnbroker and the little tailor and also thanked Providence that I had put a two dollar bill into the pocket of the trousers. Otherwise Austen might have pawned the suit ago, when the tailor brought it around to the studio.

About 5 o'clock that afternoon I dropped in upon Austen. He was smoking a good cigar and sketching a design in charcoal on a canvas.

He shut his teeth hard upon the cigar and looked at me with half shut eyes.

"Well, blast your bloomin' top lights, they didn't get it!" said he.

"Who didn't get what?" said I.

"I've had three of 'em here today," he responded. "Went to lunch with Hammon. Yes, yes; you were there. I forgot. Well, after lunch we came back here, and Harrison made another play for my valentine. Actually offered me cash, and he tried to find out what I was going to do with it. Didn't recognise the portrait. Thought I'd got a new model, confound him. After he was gone Jarbeau appeared. I think he'd been waiting around outside."

Jarbeau was the art editor whom I had taken to luncheon.

"I had a similar circus with him, except that he was sure that my pic. was for Harrison," he continued. "Well—a—well! He offered cash too. If I hadn't just eaten a full meal the temptation would have killed me."

"Good clothes sustain a man, too," said I, and he grinned at me.

"Markham was in later," said he. "He was very easy."

Markham was one of the men whom my emissary had seen.

"And you didn't sell?" I asked.

"Not for a million dollars. Sell her? I guess not. I agreed after considerable persuasion"—and he grinned with great enjoyment—"to do something else for the gentleman. They agreed to pay cash—because they thought I didn't need it, shiver their blasted timbers!

"But the valentine goes," he added. "Nothing can stop that now. Heart of gold! The dross of this world cannot buy my poor tribute which I shall lay at her feet. And a little—just a wee little bit—of hope will go with it now."

There was a moment's pause. Then he softly repeated the word "dross," which he had uttered with a fine scorn, and at the same time he put both hands into the side pockets of the coat which I had redeemed, and when he pulled them out they were full of money.

However, lest I should seem to be taking credit to myself for the success of a man now widely praised and greatly envied, let me explain that my little coup was nothing to the one which Austen himself achieved. I shudder to think what he would have lost if he had sold the valentine as I had planned.

For the memory portrait of Miss Copeland made a tremendous hit in that young lady's exalted social sphere. It started Austen on a brilliant and remunerative career as a painter of portraits for those fortunate persons who can afford to lavish money on a good man's work, and it was thus that he gained a position which enabled him to win the hand of the lady without exposing her to the paternal malediction. In fact, the old gentleman behaved very nicely.

How Many Points on Our Stars?

Most of us, if asked how many points a star should have would say five and cite the flag as proof, but the director of the mint has corrected this misapprehension in answering an inquiry on the subject. He calls attention to the fact that the stars on the great seal of the United States and on the seal of the president are five pointed, but that the stars are six pointed on the seal of the house of representatives, and, further, to the six pointed stars on the obverse of the half and quarter dollar coins and the five pointed stars on the reverse. The reverse of these coins is a copy of the great seal, with clouds and stars omitted. As is known, the six pointed stars are made from copying the colonial [illegible] after the manner of English heraldry, which sanctions that star. The stars on the flag are copied from the Washington coat of arms.—Youth's Companion.

BY ORDER of the Prsident, new designs are being prepared for the gold coins of the United States. There is large room for improvement in the stiff, conventional figures now in use, originally prepared by engravers working under mechanical impulse. The introduction of artistic quality is desirable.

"THE boasted 'chivalry' of the South," says the Philadelphia Record, "is a good deal of a humbug. A couple of years ago it did not prevent the flogging of women in the Georgia prison camps, and now its extends the "unwritten law" over a man and allows him to go free, without even a trial, the indictment being quashed, while a woman was convicted and sent to the penitentiary for eight years. In both cases the homicides were socially well connected and prominent. The man who goes free is a Congressman-elect, and the woman who is in the penitentiary is the niece of a United States Senator. The man shot a doctor who had defamed his wife, and a Louisiana judge has quashed the indictment. The woman shot a doctor who had defamed her and twelve citizens of Mississippi found her guilty and a judge sent her to the penitentiary for eight years. According to Southern chivalry a woman's honor belongs to her husband. He may kill the traducer of it, but she may not."

"THE WORLD DO MOVE."

Nothing has raised more quiet yet relentless opposition to the president since his insistence on the passage of the rate bill, than his determination to remodel the land laws of the west to prevent fraud in acquiring imperial slices of the public domain. Western congressmen are in the majority in opposition to this course, but it will be noticed in scanning their interviews in the public prints that they are usually anonymous interviews. "A prominent western Senator" or an "influential western representative" is the way that they usually mask their idenity. None the less, a reform of the land laws is coming just as certainly as railroad rate legislation came. The president happens to know a good deal personally about the land situation in the west. He is not even dealing with a subject on which he has to study up as he did most effectively on the railroad question. He knows what grazing land frauds, timber land frauds, mineral land frauds and all the other sort of land frauds mean, because he lived among the men that both commit them and suffered from them. Also he has the support of some of the best scientific experts in the government service in dealing with the problem. From the Geological Survey he has the experience of men who know mineral land, and have no more business sense than to work for the government for $2,500 a year when they could get two or three times as much on the outside. In the Forest Service, he has the experience and reliability of men like Gifford Pinchot to support him, a man who has an independent income and yet is willing to work for the good of the government service. These men are not the ones to recommend legislation that is not for the good of the general public.

Yet there is opposition. The representatives of vast financial interests say that the recommended land legislation is all wrong, and that it has its inception in the minds of men who have stolen millions of acres of land from the government and want to steal millions more.

No greater falsehood was ever advanced by the resident exponents of corporate interests. The land laws of the west needs reforming. The public domain is now centered in the west, and it is there that there are thousands of acres of mineral lands, millions of grazing land, and hundreds of thousands of acres of timber land, all of which the president wants to save to the general wealth of the nation. There is no department of the government in which grosser frauds have been committed than in the Land Office, and the sooner its rules are changed and its practices disinfected, the better it will be for the general public.

CORN JUDGING CONTESTS.

To Be Participated in at the Farmers' Institutes in Garrett.

The trustees of the Maryland Agricultural College having offered to the farmers' sons of Maryland twentv-three free scholarships to a special course of two weeks at the College, the following rules have been made to govern the competitive contests for awarding the scholarships:

The object of the scholarships being to awaken greater interest in the most important crop of the state and to help and reward those who have demonstrated their desire and ability to be helped, the selection of those to whom the scholarship shall be awarded has been wisely based upon a corn judging contest in which the reward goes to the boy who has most profitably availed himself of the means already at his command.

For several years there has been great national interest taken in the improvement of the corn crop. The Experiment Stations, the United States Department of Agriculture and intelligent farmers in all parts of the country have made earnest efforts to the solution of the problems involved and many valuable facts have been discovered. The information thus gained has been spread broadcast by means of bulletins, farmers' institutes, corn trains, and the agricultural press.

It has been found that one of the most practical and effective means towards increasing the yield of corn is in the use of better methods of seed selection, and unusual efforts have been made to bring this fact and the means employed to the attention of the farmers.

An examination of the rules governing the contest will show that every competitor will be judged absolutely on his own merits, as demonstrated in the character of his exhibit.

Competition shall be limited to sons of Maryland farmers, residents of the county in which they compete.

No one shall compete who has had a course of instruction in an Agricultural College.

Each competitor shall exhibit ten (10) ears of corn, white or yellow, selected by himself, but not necessarily grown by himself.

Each exhibit of corn shall be delivered to Mr. Amoss securely done up in a box or neat parcel, with the name of the exhibitor inside in a sealed envelope, which shall not be opened until the award has been made.

No one under fifteen or over twenty-one years of age will be allowed to enter the contest.

Each contestant must attend the day sessions of the Farmers' Institute.

These contests will take place at the various farmers' institutes to be held in Garrett county next month.

At the Oakland institute, which will be held on March 6th, State Senator W. McCulloh Brown, by request of the Director of Institutes, will speak on "The Apple Interests of Garrett County."

WASHINGTON CHAT.

Breezy, Newsy Notes From the Nation's Capitol.

Ten thousand temperance crusaders of the District of Columbia, bent upon having Congress wipe out every saloon in Washington will beseige the lawmakers in the Capitol on St. Valentine's Day, February 14th, the date set by the House District Committee for a hearing of the temperance advocates.

Rain or shine, this formidable army will assemble at a point near the White House and promptly at noon will march down Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol. Arriving there the march will be continued throughout the whole building with the idea of showing that the citizens of Washington are in earnest about the matter of prohibition in the District.

The aims of the crusaders is to have the amount of license paid by saloonkeepers increased. At present this is $800 per year, not as large as in many other cities, and by an increase it is hoped to reduce the number of saloons. The abolition of these in the District of Columbia appears to be a moving question, but it is doubtful if Congress will take any action this session. There is too much other business on the calendar of both Houses and about all that can be accomplished during the balance of the session is to pass the remaining appropriation bills. However, the temperance people are not discouraged. Their demonstration is to be a remarkable one and on St. Valentine's day every nook and corner of the big white building will echo with the cry "Down with the Saloons."

As the present session of Congress draws near a close the talk of an extra session increases, but whether the President will call a session at an early date after the 4th of March cannot be ascertained from him or from those in charge of affairs in either the Senate or the House. Senators and Representatives deny all knowledge of any such purpose on the part of the President, but often these lawmakers assume an attitude of utter ignorance and indifferenoe when it is known that in doing so they are only playing the part of statesmanship.

Persistent rumors are afloat however, that an extra session, to be a very brief one, is really to be called and not a few secretaries, clerks and other Congressional employees, who appear to have "inside" information, are making plans to remain at their posts several weeks after the 4th of March.

Washington is always in favor of an extra session. It means more money for the hotelkeepers and the merchants It prolongs the entertainments in the social set and provides amusement for the floating population which makes Washington its home only as long as Congress remains.

Just now Washington is the Mecca for candidates who are seeking positions in the new state of Oklahoma. Many of the fat plums will be ready for picking as soon as the new state is admitted to the sisterhood and from the large number of applicants who are already on the ground, so far in advance of the time the territory will become a state, it looks as if the belief among them is that the first come will be the first served. The President has given all inquirers to understand that he will pay no attention to patronage until it has been admitted on July the 4th, after which he will listen to the appeals to be made.

Probably the federal judgships are regarded as the best positions and the fight for them is shaping faster than for the other places. Every wire at the Capitol is being pulled by the candidates but the President remains firm in his determination to wait until July before making appointments, so it is likely that "back to Oklahoma" will be the order of proceedings among the candidates, until later in the year.

Machines for milking cows are in high faver with the milking experts of the Agricultural Department who have been making tests with a deviee which shows many advantages over the time-honored hand-power method. The object of these experiments is to pass upon the question as to whether machine-milking is a more sanitary process than hand-milking and the experts have declared in favor of the former, consurer in a condition as near as posible to that in which it is drawn from the udder of a healthy cow. There is also considerable time to be saved in milking.

The new device is operated by either hand or foot power, and one or two cans can be milked at option. In the operation of the machine the cow's teats are encased in cups attached by rubber piping to a suction pump and the milk is drawn from the udders by intermittent suction. The experiments made with this device not only demonstrate its practicability but also shows a material reduction in the percentage of germ life present under the hand-milking methods. The machine has already been installed by several large dairies.

The Navy Department is taking an active interest in tne Jamestown Exposition and in addition to assembling the largest fleet of American warships ever gathered together at one time, it is preparing an historic exhibit for the Government Building which is sure to be of interest to all visitors.

The exhibit consists of an eagle, ten feet high, weighing a ton and carved entirely from wood. This massive figure-head was on the bow of Captain Perry's flagship, the Niagara, when the American squadron went to Japan in 1855. Another relic is the steel scroll removed from the stern of the Olympia, the flagship of Admiral Dewey, when he won his famous victory in Manila Bay. Among other mementos going to Jamestown, will be pictures of the Constitution, Niagara, Susquehanna, of two British warships laying the Atlantic cabie, a model of the first dry dock and the old ship's bell from the frigate Constitution.

MAPLE SYRUP SEASON.

Al. Walters is back from a trip up to Somerset county, the maple sugar district of Pennsylvania, and says that the people there are already preparing to tap the great maples of that section in order to get sap for the delicious maple syrup served at the breakfast table on griddle cakes.

He says that the maple syrup season in Somerset county is the most joyful time of the year, and that a great amount of work connected with the "boils" is done free by the army of young folk that visit the maple camps where sap of the trees is boiled to maple syrup and sugar. This year the Somerset county farmers who engage in the business expect to break all records. The winter weather has been exactly to their liking, extremely cold previous to "going up" of the sap in the trees. They figure that by March 1, they will be able to go forth in the groves and tap the maple trees and expect the juicy maple water to flow big. In Somerset county it is not gathered in bottles like it is in some country sections. There the farmer puts out gallon buckets on his preserve expecting them to be filled before he disturbs them. The sap is then taken to a central camp where the great kettle renders the maple water to syrup and candy. Many hundred gallons are secured in Somerset county annually, and high prices are paid for the product. A maple tree in that county is looked upon with reverence and none of them are ever injured or destroyed.—Connellsville Courier.

Energetic Young Men.

Mr. J. A Beachy, of Grantsville, Md., farmer and coal operator was a town visitor yesterday on business. He is a son of the late Aaron Beachy so well known to our older people. Mr. Beachy does a large coal business, the mines he operates are on his own land. He is also a stock breeder, his specialty being young and heavy draft horses. He also has a fine flock of shropshire sheep. Mr. Beachy brought over to town his brother, J. W. Beachy, who is the purchasing agent of a large department store at Marionette, Wisconsin, and also manager of a store at Green Bay, Wis., and who was on his way to New York to make his purchases. Both of the young men are hustlers, prudent as well as energetic, and both will make their mark in their respective calling.—Meyersdale Republican.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

Mrs. E. Z. Tower will leave Oakland tonight for New York City where she will visit her brother, Dr. Bullard, who is in that city taking a special course in medicine, having arrived there recently from Newfoundland, where he is a practicing physician.

Mr. William P. Lee, administrator of the personal estate of his brother, the late Yantz Lee, has advertised by posters printed at the office the sale of horses, vehicles, etc., to take place at the home of the deceased near the Red House on Tuesday, March 6th.

County Superintendent of Schools Ed. A. Browning went to Annapolis Tuesday night to attend an educational meeting. On his return from that city he will go to Grantsville where he will attend the teachers institute to be held there tomorrow and Saturday.

Dr. W. W. Davis and Mrs. Davis, who arrived here from Baltimore, their winter home, on last Thursday afternoon, returned Tuesday morning. Dr. Davis will again be in Oakland either this afternoon or tomorrow to assist in the revival at St. Paul's church.

The social meetings announced in this paper last week to be held by the ladies of the Lutheran and Presbyterians churches on Wednesday and Thursday evenings respectively, have been postponed on account of the special services now in progress in the Methodist church.

Don't forget the prize of ten dollars offered by a gentleman through THE REPUBLICAN for the best crop of potatoes raised this year on one-quarter acre of ground in Garrett county. See the last issue of this paper for particulars. Farmers in all sections of the county may compete for the prize.

A very large number of the good people of the good people of Deer Park drove up to Mountain Lake Park in their sleds and sleighs last Saturday afternoon, surprising their pastor and family with a very liberal donation. An hour or so was spent in pleasant conversation and music then all returned to their homes.

To bring up a child in the way he should go, travel that way yourself. Stories first heard at a mother's knee are never wholly forgotten; a little spring that never dries up on our journey through scorching years. The sooner you get a child to be a law unto himself, the sooner you make a man of him. Children need models more than criticism. We can never check what is in the young unless we cherish what is good in them.

THE DEATH RECORD.

FREDERICK WERNER.

Last Thursday morning at his home near Finzel, Md., just across Mason and Dixon's line, Frederick Werner, the eldest of a family of six Werner brothers, who in the early fifties of the century made America their adopted home, died, aged 80 years, 8 months and 25 days.

Mr. Werner was born at Seiferts Hausen, in the district of Rotenburg, Germany. His father was Adam Werner and his mother's maiden name was Annie Catharine Sass. The father of Adam Werner was August Werner. With the rest of a numerous family young Frederick was reared to a life of unusual hardships. He, however, received the thorough schooling of the compulsory education system of Germany up to the age of 14. At the age of 18 he entered upon the three years' military service prescribed by the laws of the Fatherland and when, in 1848, war broke out between Germany and Denmark, over the German Danish provinces of Schleswick Holstein, he was in line for real military service and served through that historic struggle. After completing his military service he sailed for America, landing at Baltimore and working his way westward as far as Meyers Mills (now Meyersdale) where, in 1852, he got permanent employment with Peter Meyers. Here he was soon joined by his brother Henry, and together they earned the money required to bring across their parents and their four remaining brothers: George, Christian, Paul and Conrad, all of whom settled down near Meyersdale. After them came at least a score of of families of relatives who have scattered over the southeastern townships of Somerset county.

Early in life Frederick Werner married Barbara Deist, who died last year. They had twelve children, eight of whom survive: William, Christian and Adam, of Finzel, Md.; Simon, of Meyersdale; Eliza (Conrad), of New Castle, Pa.; Mary (Steinly), of Finzel, Md.; Susan (Shockey), of Deal.

Mr. Werner was a man of rare good judgment, conservative in his business exploits and universally successful. His plantation near Finzel originally comprised (four 100 acres) State plots of fine agricultural land, which he later parceled out to his sons. He had a most kindly disposition, was a devout member of the German Reformed church and leaves to his offspring a rich legacy of a life lived for the attainment of the highest ideals.

The funeral, which was largely attended, took place at the Greenville township Union church last Saturday, where Rev. Shupe, the Reformed pastor, paid a glowing tribute to the life of the departed.—Rockwood Leader.

The bell for St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church, which arrived here early last week from the foundry at Troy, New York, was placed in the belfry last Saturday afternoon by Mr. D. E. Bolden, assisted by a number of members of the church and some other willing helpers. The bell has a sweet mellow tone, being very much the same as the bell in the old church. The framework, hanger and bell weighs nearly two thousand pounds. It was used for the first time on last Sunday morning.

Judge U. S. Kendall, who went to Oregon where the company controlled by his brothers, the Kendall Lumber Company, own a large body of timber land, arrived in Oakland last Thursday and will remain here a few days prior to going to Pittsburg and other points where the Kendalls have large interests. Judge Kendall is thoroughly in love with the west and is greatly pleased with the business prospects of that section of the country.

In this age of trusts the newspaper man has not been forgotten, and so we have the type founders trust. There can be no doubt as to its existence with the present price of printers' material all priced alike in the different catalogues, and all cuts on discounts coming from the different houses in the same form and at the same time. The publishers have been quietly enduring the extortion of the type founders for years, and it is time we had our innings.

Start right, boys. To be anybody, to accomplish anything for yourself or the community, you cannot be idle. Don't drink—liquor destroys the mind and body. Don't swear—gentlemen do not. It is low aud vulgar. Don't read trashy literature. It leads to the devil. Don't hang around saloons. Good men are not made that way. Whenever you see a man lying around a saloon the devil is after him and will get him sooner or later.

Mr. Roy C. Hamill, son of Mr. and Mrs. M. R. Hamill, of Oakland, came over from Upper Potomac, West Va., last Saturday and spent the two following days with his parents here. Mr. Hamill, a year or two ago engaged himself as an employee of the Upper Potomac Coal Company in a minor position, being steadily advanced as he perfected himself in the details of the work, until on last Friday he was made superintendent of the works with a lucrative salary. His friends in Oakland congratulate him on his advancement.

Mr. Willlam P. Hansel, of District No. 11, was in the city this morning transacting business.

Prospectus of Yough River Oil and Gas Company of Garrett County.

For many years past it has been a matter of almost universal belief that oil and gas exists in paying quantities in Garrett county, Maryland.

This belief has been accentuated and intensified by the discovery of oil in different springs and water courses in what is known as the "oil belt" as defined by men who profess to know where the oil exists in this section of the country.

With the object of developing the territory, a corporation has been formed, under the laws of the State of Maryland, under the name of Yough River Oil and Gas Company of Garrett County with an authorized capital of $10,000, divided into 1000 shares of the par value of $10.00 per share.

In every movement for the development of a new Oil and Gas territory more or less uncertainty naturally exists as to the outcome—in other words, it is looked upon as a venture merely, and this effort to definitely determine the existence of Oil and Gas in this territory in paying quantities, is not different from the same conditions heretofore met with elsewhere.

The main question for decision by an intending investor is this: will an honest test be made of the Oil and Gas producing possibilities of this territory? If an honest test is made then public spiritedness on the part of the citizens of Garrett County should induce them without hesitation to subscribe to the stock of this Company and help a public enterprise.

If success comes and the Oil and Gas is found in paying quantities, a rich reward will be theirs who have subscribed to the stock of the company.

The development will result in enhanced values to real estate in this county, and such prosperity as only comes to those communities where these natural products are found.

This company is officered by men who are identified with the development, growth and prosperity of Garrett County, and their connection with the enterprise should be sufficient evidence that an honest test will be made, and the money entrusted to them will be judicially expended and faithfully accounted for.

The books of the company will be open at all times to the inspection of the stockholders and the exact condition of the company can at all times be known to those interested.

The Company has already secured leases upon 10,000 acres, and its holdings cover the greater part of the supposed "Oil Belt" in Garrett county.

The stock of the company is offered for sale at par—$10.00 per share.

Terms of subscription—25 per cent. to be paid at the time of subscribing; 25 per cent. when the first well is located 25 per cent. when the first well is down 500 feet, and 25 per cent. when the first well is down 1000 feet, or if Oil or Gas be struck at a less depth than 1000 feet then the last payment of 25 per cent. will be due and payable. Parties desiring to pay their subscriptions in full at the time of subscribing are at liberty to do so, and certificates of stock will be issued to them at once.

All payments on account of subscriptions to the capital stock of the company are to be made to A. G. Sturgiss, Treasurer.

The officers of the corporation are Major J. M. Burns, Morgantown, W. Va., President; Chauncey Kimmell, Oakland, Vice President; A. G. Sturgiss, Oakland, Treasurer; N. S. Heindel, Oakland, Secretary. The directors are Wm. R. Stull, Oakland; J. M. Burns, Morgantown; A. G. Sturgiss, Oakland; John E. Wood, Baltimore; A. S. Teats, Oakland; Chauncey Kimmell, Oakland; J. W. Alderton, Mt. Lake Park; L. T. Yoder, Pittsburg; Samuel W. Vandersaal, Pittsburg; F. A. Thayer, Oakland; J. T. Mitchell, Oakland, and E. H. Sincell, Oakland.

Call for Your Letters.

Walter Watson, Mrs. Dr. S. Clagett, Glades Hotel, Thomas Callory, Michael Murphy, N. L. McGregor, Grover C. King, Howard King, Mrs. Samuel Clagett, Katie Baugh, Taylor O'Brien, Pioneer Lumber Co.

Born, unto Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Butler, yesterday morning, a son. The couple are extremely happy over the event.

The day of union church work is approaching slowly but surely. The Cumberland and regular Presbyterian churches have gotten together on common ground and there is fair prospects for the two Methodists churches coming together. A move is on foot to unite the Baptist and Christian churches. It begins to look favorable for the realization of a long drawn out dream.

Mr. Julius K. Monroe, of Kingwood, came over to Oakland last night with the intention of going out along the Maryland-West Virginia boundary to make some locations of some property grants, but the storm which came up this morning forced him to abandon the contemplated trip.

N. Murphy, Esq., chief of police of Grantsville, was in Oakland Monday on business when he called to see THE REPUBLICAN. Mr. Murphy's official duties as a conservator of the peace in the city along the National Road are so strenuous than he seldom gets a chance to visit other towns of the county, Monday being the first and only time that he ever came in contact with Oakland and her citizens. He thinks well of us and our town and promised to be more frequent in his visits hereafter.

A small Kansas boy was once called in to view his new born baby brother. He looked it over with dissatisfaction, and finally asked: "Mamma, where did this thing come from?" "An angel brought it Jimmie." "Wuz you awake when he came?" "Certainly Jimmie." "Well, then, mamma, all that I have got to say, is that you are dead easy. I'd like to see any old angel put off such a looking thing on me. But I reckon we are stuck unless I kin work Johnny Green to trade it sight-unseen for one of his spotted pups."

Mr. Ephraim W. Kelso, who made a tour of the southwest, visiting his son at Las Cruces, New Mexico, and also going over into old Mexico, returned to Oakland last Thursday evening, very much gratified with the country through which he traveled. Mr. Kelso brought home with him a number of curios which he gathered up during his travels. His letters descriptive of his journey were extremely interesting to our readers, and gave them an insight into the great possibilities of Texas and the Southwest generally.

WANTED—Information as to address of Thomas H. Frost or widow or heirs if dead. He was born in Allegany county, Md., about 1839, and served in Co. A, First W. Va. Cav., in the Civil War. About 1873 he lived in Colorado. Small recovery can probably be made. Address Harvey Spalding & Sons, Washington, D. C.

Elsewhere in this paper today is published the prospectus of the Yough River Oil and and Gas Company of Garrett county, which was recently incorporated under the laws of the State of Maryland for the purpose of boring for oil and gas near Oakland. The company, as set forth in the prospectus, has under lease a large body of land lying adjacent to Oakland, upon which operations will soon begin. The company has some of the best citizens of the county interested in it, while outside capital is also interested to some extent, It is the purpose of the corporation to begin boring just as soon as possible, the point at which the first well is to be located having already been selected. If either oil or gas is fonnd, no matter in how small quantities, business will take on a boom in this part of the county that will be a surprise to all of us, and everybody will participate.

BOWSER THE GENIUS.

Designs Improvements That He Thinks Will Bring Him Millions.

ONE A TWO HEADED MATCH.

Another Is a Device to Keep Pedestrians From Slipping on the Ice, and Still Another Is the Interchangeable Shoe Heel.

[Copyright, 1907, by P. C. Eastment.]

That Mr. Bowser was laboring under great mental exhilaration and excitement was plain to Mrs. Bowser the minute he entered the hall the other evening as he reached home from the office. After a look at him she asked:

"Has anything unexpectedly good happened you today?"

"Not unexpectedly," he replied. "I've always known that it would come sooner or later."

"What is it?"

"I'll explain after dinner. Let's go right down now, as I'm as hungry as a wolf."

At the dinner table she tried to extract some information, but he would only chuckle in reply. He was in such high spirits that the cat dared to come and rub himself against his leg, and, although the cook was trembling over the tough steak, he worried it down without a word of fault. Mrs. Bowser gave him up after awhile and groaned as she thought that he might have got chicken farming on the brain again.

"MRS. BOWSER, ACROSS THE FOREHEAD OF YOUR HUSBAND YOU CAN WRITE THE WORD 'GENIUS.'"

When dinner had been finished and they had reached the sitting room he was ready to explain.

"Mrs. Bowser," he began, "do you know that the man who invented the telephone has made millions of dollars out of it?"

"I presume he has."

"And that the man who invented the phonograph has an income of $42,000 a day from it?"

"It may be so."

Fortune in Inventions.

"It is so. Invent a good thing—something that the public wants—and your fortune is made. I have had that idea to the front for the last ten years. Many and many a night when you thought I was asleep I have been working my brain over an invention to make us millionaires."

"But you never said anything about it," she replied.

"No, I never did. There are lots of things a husband never says anything about to his wife. I have kept quiet all these long years thinking to give you a glad surprise some day."

"And has the time finally come?"

"It has. Mrs. Bowser, across the forehead of your husband you can write the word 'Genius.' You can write it three times if you like, for I have invented three articles that are bound to put my name alongside of Edison's and to bring in money by the barrel."

"You don't tell me! Why, you quite take my breath away. Let us hear what you have done. As your wife I want to be the first to congratulate you."

Mr. Bowser crossed his hands behind him and swelled out his chest and promenaded up and down the room for a little and then asked:

"Mrs. Bowser, how many matches are used in the United States alone in one year?"

"Millions and millions."

"Yes, and you can make it billions and billions while you are about it. How many are used, take the whole world together?"

"The number can hardly be computed."

Designs Double Headed Match.

"You are right. It's quadrillions ten times over. Look here. I scratch this match to light my cigar. It accomplishes the purpose, burns halfway down, and I throw the other half away. Do you see the point?"

"I'm afraid not."

"Easy as falling downstairs. Make a double headed match, and you have two for one. In other words, the world uses just half as many matches as now. Saves timber, saves work, saves money. A child can see the economy of it. There will be a saving of a hundred million dollars a year by using the Bowser double headed match. What do you think of it?"

"Why, the idea looks all right," she answered in dubious tones.

"And it is all right. Now for No. 2. Why do we wear rubbers over our shoes in the winter?"

"To keep us from slipping down."

"Exactly. Over 50,000,000 pairs of rubbers are sold in the United States every winter. The world takes billions of pairs. Suppose, Mrs. Bowser, we didn't have to wear any rubbers at all? Suppose a substitute for them was invented—something costing less than a nickel? Can you figure what the saving would be?"

"It would certainly be immense," she replied.

"You are right, it would—millions and millions of dollars. My income from the patent alone will be $99,000,000 a year. When the sidewalks are slippery they sprinkle ashes on them, don't they—ashes or sand? Why not let each pedestrian carry his own? The Bowser self sprinkler and non-slipper simply consists of a hollow bamboo strapped to the outside of each leg and filled with sand or ashes. Every time you throw your leg out a spring ejects a quantity of the sand or ashes just where you are going to place your foot. One filling does for a mile walk. Filled with a funnel in one minute and no muss made. Depots all along the principal streets for refilling. The bamboos for sale at every grocery, and one is warranted to last ten years. Made for all lengths of leg. Painted in all colors or the wood left in its natural state. Crooked bamboos for folks with crooked legs. You can take 'em off or strap 'em on quicker than you can tie a shoe. What do you think of it?"

"I shouldn't like to give you an answer until I have thought it over for a spell," answered Mrs. Bowser.

"The idea must commend itself to every one with an ounce of brains. We now pass on to No. 3. Nineteen persons out of twenty, no matter what the age or sex, run the heels of their shoes over. If it wasn't for this fact there'd hardly be a cobbler in business. Every run over heel is repaired at a cost of 15 cents, and repairs must be made at least five times a year. That is 75 cents a heel, or $1.50 for a pair of shoes. In most cases this is half the original cost. A thousand million people are going to the cobbler five times a year. Suppose their heels didn't run over? Suppose they didn't have to go to the cobbler's? Suppose that gigantic sum of money could be saved?"

Changeable Shoe Heel.

"But can it be?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"The easiest thing in the world. See that all your shoes are fitted with the Bowser interchangeable heel. Fitted with a steel spring and catch. Heels taken off and changed in thirty seconds. By changing the heels are bound to wear level. Sixty million dollars a year royalty for me in this alone. I was lying on my back in bed when the idea came to me. It's going to put a hundred thousand cobblers out of business, but I shall give all of them a chance to drive ice wagons. There you are, Mrs. Bowser, and now tell me whether your husband is a man with brains in his head or only an old stump?"

"Have you talked with any one about your invention?" she asked.

"No. I was waiting to hear what you would say."

"Well, if I was you I'd go over and have a talk with the druggist. I have heard it said that he is a very keen man. I'd like to know what he thinks about things."

"I'll go at once. Yes, he's a pretty sharp man, and he'll see the value of my inventions at once. Hurrah for the Bowser family! They're all right."

It was a leisure hour with the druggist, and he listened closely to all that Mr. Bowser had to say. When the story was finished he rose up and removed the hat from the head of the genius, rubbed his hand over the baldness, and, leading Mr. Bowser to the door and gently pushing him out into the winter world, he said:

"Go home and soak it, old friend."

The minutes went by, and Mrs. Bowser wondered why the genius did not return. The minutes made an hour and then two of them. Then she went to the front door to look out and saw something huddled up on the top step. It was broken hearted, and the tears had run down its cheeks and frozen hard.

"Poor Mr. Bowser!" she sighed as she helped the bundle in and laid it on the lounge and covered it up and gave it ginger tea.

The genius had fallen down once more.

The Discovery of His Kingdom.

By LOUISE J. STRONG.

Copyright, 1906, by P. C. Eastment.

She gave him a cheery greeting as she passed, which Deardorf returned with stiff embarrassment. Women always embarrassed him, which fact had been construed into a dislike of the sex, thus accounting for his bachelorhood.

No one would have believed that he lounged on the veranda solely that he might watch her down the street. Much less would any one have imagined that every time he looked into her candid womanly eyes his lonely, unmated man soul clamored for the home and companionship he saw therein. He had not learned that this kingdom in woman's eyes is discernible only to the king to whom it is given to possess if he will. Therefore the little music teacher with the bloom of youth behind her was to him most desirable in the eyes of all men, and he was not surprised, only startled to the stopping of his heart, at what he overheard from a couple of young men behind him.

"She will make him a sweet little wife—the lucky dog!" one exclaimed.

"The sweetest in the world," the other assented. "And there's nothing for the rest of us but hunting wedding presents. Come on."

They went their way, and with strangely blurred vision he stumbled up the stairs and through the gloom of the hall to his rooms at the end. Her door was opposite, and as he fumbled with his key he glanced across furtively with an odd sense of guilt for the accustomed thrill that shook him. It was as if she were already the wife of another, and, closing his door with emphasis, he turned on the light and set about packing his minerals, telling himself that he would move immediately—that there was neither sense nor reason in his staying in this dingy place where his poverty, long a thing of the past, had at first stranded him; no reason, except that, catlike, he clung to the place as home, and—yes, he would acknowledge it—because she was there. He frowned and essayed a nonchalant whistle when he caught himself, as usual, straining his ears for the sound of her footsteps. It was time that he went.

But subsequent reflection persuaded him that his departure at this juncture might be connected with her marriage and excite comment. He felt that he must remain until the "lucky dog" had carried her away, and—he blushed painfully at the thought—he must procure the inevitable wedding present if he would not be conspicuous.

Then followed strenuous days and sleepless nights of vain endeavor to decide upon something, with bitter reviling of the custom which forbade his presenting her with a goodly check in lieu of an article which would probably be but an unwelcome duplicate. He hunted the shops and stores, confusing himself uselessly with the multitude and variety of their wares. He grew thin and heavy eyed under the burden, thereby arousing in her an anxious solicitude he was too absorbed to perceive. In despair he sought advice of the office boy.

"Billy," he asked that versatile young person, "what would you give to a lady for a wedding present?"

"Aw, that's easy! Something she'd like, of course," Billy said airily. Then he explained: "I mean, sir, something you've heard her say she'd like. That's the only kind o' present worth having, only folks won't give 'em. I've tried it, a-hinting and a-hinting what I want Christmases and birthdays, and I always get some old thing I wouldn't take if I could help it," Billy sniffed.

That seemed an eminently sensible suggestion to Deardorf, and he presented a grateful dollar to Billy for the idea, realizing when he came to make application of it that the only object of which he had any knowledge concerning her desires was undoubtedly questionable regarded as a wedding present. Still, according to Billy's decision, it would be a pleasure to her.

He had one day chanced upon her standing behind two little girls who were engrossed in the contemplation of an entrancing toy tea set in a shop window. It was obvious that such contemplation was all their lot in life allowed, and she was fingering her slim purse doubtfully, with moist eyes.

"I was wondering if I might not give it to them for the sake of a lonely little girl whose one desire in life was a vain longing for a tiny tea set," she said as he stopped.

"Let me," he begged, expanding under the influence of her impulsive confidence.

After some insistence she yielded. They took the amazed children inside, and she examined and extolled each small article with a delight that equaled theirs.

"We do not all put away childish things with years," she said when they were outside. "I love the woo things yet, and some time"—she smiled defiantly—"some time, when I can and not feel it a wicked extravagance, I am going to have my childish heart's desire. I am so sure that you will not laugh at me that I will invite you in to my first tea party."

He thanked her gravely, understanding and sympathizing entirely. Did he not carry in his pocket a wonderful carnelian "taw" in memory of the ungratified longing of the boy he used to be? He had been waiting for the Christmas opportunity to gratify her innocent desire, reveling in imagination in the intimacy of her promised hospitality. Now he had put away his day dream with a sigh and extinguished a dim hope that had glimmered feebly.

But it remained that he must make the wedding present, and finally, being confident of her perfect sincerity, he ignored obtruding doubts as to appropriateness and procured a fairylike tea set worthy the possession of a princess, which, being unequal to presenting it personally, he left at her door with his card one evening, just escaping her as she came up the stairs.

And then, when it was done, he for the first time considered his offering from the probable viewpoint of the prospective bridegroom and her friends, and the utter absurdity of it overwhelmed him. With shame he decided that after such a piece of idiocy there was nothing for him but flight, and he was tossing things helter skelter into his suit case when he heard her crossing the hall.

He looked about desperately for a way of escape, then dragged himself unwillingly to the door at her rap.

"I have only this moment realized how preposterous my unfortunate selection is for a wedding present," he stammered abjectly as she entered.

"Oh!" The glow on her face faded. "How stupid of me! I ought to have known there was a mistake, and I have opened the box." She set it upon the table.

He shook his head dismally. "There is no mistake. I beg your pardon. I—I"—

"But there must be a mistake! They left the package at my door," she said, a little sharply.

"I left it myself. I meant it for a wedding present, but I see how"—His voice failed again.

She regarded his woebegone face intently for a moment. "Very well, I will take it down." Her cheeks were glowing and her eyes sparkling with mischief. "When I found the package I thought you had somehow discovered that today is my birthday and had kindly remembered my childish longing, but if it is a wedding present it must go to Miss Bessie, who is soon to be married."

He sat down heavily and stared at her.

"You see, one must be married to receive a wedding present," she explained demurely, her color flaming under his gaze.

The tangle suddenly straightened, he sprang up. "Yes," he assented, still looking into her eyes, where by a flash of inspiration he had seen his kingdom, himself crowned king. He plunged forward across the table and seized her hands, asserting boldly, "It is a wedding present—your wedding present, Alma, dear, for you are going to be married immediately."

For answer she murmured tearfully and happily, "Oh, Morris, we will have tea in the darling little cups our first evening at home!"

Ripened Romance.

On the occasion of the ninetieth birthday of Dr. Martineau, who preached in Liverpool for many years, Sir Henry Roscoe, the English chemist, congratulated him on attaining such a fine old age. The distinguished clergyman said that he had been overwhelmed with congratulations and that he was working through the letters he had received.

"By degrees," he said, "I shall answer them all.

"One of the most remarkable," Dr. Martineau continued, "was from a lady, the only person who addressed me as 'Dear James.' I had not seen her since we were boy and girl together in Norwich. She is one of the daughters of Dr. Rigby in that city. My friends used to joke me as a young man about Miss Jane Rigby, and I received their chaff pleasantly. I believed her long since dead; and now comes this letter to remind me of her existence and her friendly recollection of me."

The old minister paused an instant, then added, with a tremulous smile, "She is now also in her ninetieth year."

The Regulation of Life Insurance Companies.

By Governor CHARLES S. DENEEN of Illinois.

THE subject of life insurance has commanded more attention and discussion in the last two years than any other. The magnitude of the amounts involved and the number of persons DIRECTLY INTERESTED make this one of the most important subjects to be considered at this time.

Investigations of companies and their methods were taken up, first by the Armstrong committee in New York and followed by other committees, composed of governors, attorneys general and insurance commissioners of various states.

Certain existing laws should be amended and other laws enacted in order to protect holders in these various companies.

The funds of these companies should be as perfectly conserved as can be done by human agency, because they are in a large measure the ONLY PROTECTION of the widow and the orphan.

Among the most important of the subjects to be considered are the following:

A change of the basis of reserve valuation from the actuaries' 4 per cent to the American EXPERIENCE, 3½ per cent. It is difficult to find such safe investments as life insurance companies should make which will net 4 per cent interest. This change is in harmony with the best thought AND PRACTICE in connection with this subject.

STANDARD PROVISIONS, PERFECTLY PROTECTING THE EQUITIES OF THE INSURED, SHOULD BE INCORPORATED IN EVERY POLICY, AND NO LIFE INSURANCE FUNDS SHOULD BE USED FOR ANY POLITICAL OR SIMILAR PURPOSE.

Perhaps the most important subject for consideration is that of dividends. The recent investigations have shown that the ANNUAL ACCOUNTING of dividends, or surplus, has kept managements honest and conservative. The long deferred distributions have led to extravagance, if not dishonesty. In order to insure economy and security it seems wise to require that managers handling large trust funds should be checked up AT FREQUENT INTERVALS. Deferred dividends can be safely written provided the surplus accruing be apportioned yearly and charged as a liability by the company. A statement of such surplus SHOULD BE FURNISHED THE POLICY HOLDER EACH YEAR. If not deferred for too long a period, this will enable a young company to establish itself without endangering the equities of its policy holders.

The act to prevent discrimination by life insurance companies should be so amended as to make this evil a MISDEMEANOR and should apply to the insured as well as the company and its agent.

A law should be enacted to protect holders of deferred dividend policies already in force in the distribution of surplus accumulated on their account. A statement should be required of the annual credits on account of such surplus, which should be charged AS A LIABILITY by the companies. This is not retroactive, but a guarantee of future good faith in the handling of such funds.

IN THE MATTER OF THE ELECTION OF TRUSTEES OF MUTUAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANIES THE VOTING SHOULD BE MADE AS SIMPLE AND EFFECTIVE AS POSSIBLE, EITHER BY MAIL, IN PERSON OR BY PROXY.

The Progress of the Negro.

By WILLIAM T. VERNON (Colored), Register of the Treasury of the United States.

THE progress of the negro in America since the emancipation is WITHOUT PARALLEL in the history of the world. The spirit of the Anglo-Saxon for progress along all lines has been exhibited by his former slaves, and the manhood and INDESTRUCTIBLE WORTH which these former slaves have exhibited should appeal for fair treatment to the manhood of every American. To argue that education should be denied him is to argue against the best interests of the government. Our best citizenship is that which knows its rights and is accorded them, which knows its duty and performs it. IGNORANCE in a country such as ours cannot be made the mother of devotion, which is another name for patriotism, upon which rests the safety of the republic. In war the negro has a record of which he is not ashamed.

Let us not be content on our past efforts for race security. Let our accomplishments of the past be a guarantee of our future efforts.

The strongest of the race should help the weakest. Those who see the light should point the way to those who see it not. We should seek to reform those of the race whose tread has been other than upward. To go among these with the spirit of Christ, showing them their weakness and convincing them of their errors, is not only a duty to them, but to ourselves.

THE MORAL EVOLUTION OF MAN HAS BEEN BUT A CONSEQUENT STEP IN THE MARCH OF PROGRESS. LEARNING MORE OF THE RIGHT, DUTY INCUMBENT DEMANDS THAT HE DO MORE OF THE RIGHT.

Switzerland and America

By EDOUARD MULLER, President of Switzerland.

THERE are only two points on which the relations of Switzerland and the United States might be improved. These are the commercial and emigration questions, and they are matters which perhaps cannot be arranged by the United States ONESIDEDLY. We have an active trade with the United States as much as with France. Last year we exported $5,000,000 worth of goods to the United States and received $11,400,000 worth, but while we paid about 50 per cent of the value of our goods in duties we only raised a very small import duty in Switzerland on American goods—about 1 per cent. Surely under these conditions a COMMERCIAL TREATY between Switzerland and the United States seems desirable.

I do not agree with the pessimists who believe that the United States has reached the zenith of its prosperity. I have a deep conviction that the United States will be THE NATION OF THE FUTURE.

I DO NOT SHARE THE APPREHENSIONS FELT IN SOME QUARTERS OF AN IMPENDING CONFLICT BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND JAPAN.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

There is a large number of teachers throughout the county who should contribute an article to this column. Why delay longer? Every instructor who is ambitious should take advantage of this opportunity for self-improvement as well as for helping the schools of the county. Only a few weeks remain before the contest will close.

The "Atlantic Educational Journal" is very liberal this month in its praise of this column which is devoted to education. That publication says the movement will surely make better schools throughout the county; for these articles are sure to influence the teacher to be better fitted for his work and in bringing before the parents each week some thoughts about our schools.

The following article has been receive for publication in the series:

WHO IS THE BACKBONE OF THE SCHOOL?

It was pointed out a few weeks ago in this column that the teacher shoulders only a small part of the responsibility for the success of the school; he or she feels that their allegiance is to the school board. The following week it was shown that the trustees are not expected to be the main-stay of the school; for the trustee who does all that is expected of him does only a very little towards the real effectiveness of the instruction. In this article, therefore, it is the purpose to try and show upon whom does rest the responsibility for the success of the school. And this article will be a failure if at the close the reader does not agree that the real success depends upon the parents, and that they therefore are the backbone of the school if there be any backbone at all.

In the majority of the schools of Garrett County the parents leave the work wholly to the teacher and to the trustees, neither of whom are concerned one-half as much as the parents should be in the future success of their children. The concern of the parents naturally extend farther than that of the others connected with the school, for they have a duty in seeing that their children are educated so that they will be worthy and safe citizens. Too many parents take no interest at all in the schools, with the result that the children often are educated so that they are more dangerous to the country with an education than without one; they have been educated in the wrong way with the result that they are dangerous citizens. The parents neglected their duty in not seeing that they were being educated in the virtue rather than in vice. A son or daughter improperly educated is as much the heaviness of their parents as is an ignorant one. Let the parents look after the school and see that their children have the proper associations and are being taught honesty and righteousness as well as history and reading.

We would not have the reader infer that the parents never take an intesest in the schools. Such a conclusion would be false, for when there is trouble in the school, some student proclaiming that he has seen partiality shown in the school, or some other affair has taken place, then the parents will storm the school house and will jump into the fray with all their weight, adding oil to the fire. The teacher is not worth his salt unless he will do everything in his power to keep out of unnecessary trouble. The modern pedagog fears a fight as much as a dog does a boy with a tin can and a string. The teacher is not going to make any unnecessary exhibition of his great prerogatives.

How can the parents help the school, and how can they take the part which the writer thinks that they should take in the schools? There are but two things they are asked to do. One is to visit the school at least once a year; and the other is to confer with the teacher about the work that their children are doing; telling the teacher what their child dislikes, what it seems to be particularly well-disposed towards, and in what way it treats the work of the school. The child will express itself truthfully and openly about these things to their parents but are sealed as tight as a clam or as enigmatical as it is possible for them to be when they are before the teacher. But if the teacher knew as much about the pupil as the parents do, about his attitudes towards study and such like, the instructor could lead the child with far greater understanding and wisdom.

Children delight to have visitors to the school; and parents can do nothing which will please the school more, will inspire the workers therein with renewed hope and greater ambitions, than to drop in once in a while. As soon as a visitor comes in, everyone puts on his or her best behavior, the teacher included, even though I am one of them. If the parent can cause fifty students to do better work, why should they then not do as this article asks, and visit occasionals the place where their children are being prepared for their life's work? Would the same parents, if they had cattle to pasture, turn them loose upon some ground which had never been looked over by them to see if there is anything within the enclosure for the cattle to get? No, indeed; such a parent would called foolish; yet there are hundreds of them who turn their children into a school to be trained for life and yet have never visited the school to see if it is a fit place for their children to be permitted to go. The field of pasture for the cattle must be looked after; but the field of knowledge for the children needs no such inspection. Are we as parents consistent?

Furthermore, a visit to the school often has far wide influence and nobler results than a call to some neighbor's house, where all sorts of gossip is reveled in; or in some store, where often the conversation is of such a nature that Satan himself, being present, often leaves in disgust and shame and makes his way back to his home with all possible speed. If these same gossipers were visiting occasionally at the school they would necessarily be benefitted by coming in contact with a place where self-impovement is the key-stone.

Such visits should show the parent if the stories the children tell have even a thread of truth running through them. Children will twist some little incident of the school into a story that would make the murdering Nero want to come back to this earth and put all the teachers to an immediate death. Children can not tell falsehoods nor exaggerate if the parents have been there and have seen and are confident that the teacher is doing as well as anyone can who is not an angel.

Unless the parents show the small interest I have suggested, there will be many falsehoods carried from the school, many exaggerations, and the work of the school furthermore will be exceedingly hampered. It is this lack of co-operation of the parents which has held back the rural schools of Garrett county. If the teacher is inefficient, by visiting the school this will be shown; do not take heresay evidence from the children. If the teacher is not equal to the needs, have him removed. This can not be done of course by one parent; neither should it be if there is but one parent displeased; but if the teacher is really incapable all of the parents will learn it by their visits; if all of them are of the same mind, then will the teacher surely look for another position.

The schools of this county will never be equal to those of the other counties of the State until the parents show the proper spirit of helpfulness; until they learn that the schools are conducted for their children's advancement; until they know that the teacher can not do his best until the parents lend a helping hand; until they learn that the teacher is in the school for only a short time, a year or so, and so can not be vitally nor personally interested in the manhood or womanhood of the students; until they appreciate that the work of the trustees is exceedingly small when compared to the needs; neither will the schools be at their best until the parents take such a great interest in the work being done that will compel the trustees and the teachers to look to them for approval and for cooperation, and not to the school board at Oakland for help, inspiration, and ideas. The schools will never do their best until such a relation of affairs is brought about —that is, that the parents will step in, cooperate, and make themselves a part of the school system; as it is today, the parents are almost wholy disregarded simply because they do not let their existence in the world be known, except when there is trouble.

In conclusion, the writer would like for the parents to remember this: that it is a difficult for the teacher to instruct the children, to bring out the best that is in them, without the cooperation of the parents, as "it is for you to put butter through a key-hole with a red-hot awl."

CONTRIBUTION NO. 11.

A CAVE FULL OF DEAD MONKS.

Strange Discovery Made By Some Explorers in Turkestan.

Dr. von Le Coq has made some remarkable discoveries in East Turkestan, where he was sent on behalf of the German Government to make excavations, says the London Express.

The expedition, after digging for three months at the buried city of Karakhoja, between Turfan and Lukchun, secured a great quantity of manuscripts.

They lay hidden in caves filled with mud. They were on Chinese paper, white leather or wood. Numerous wall paintings were discovered some on plaster with a background of gold leaf, others on mud. These paintings are Buddhistic.

Altogether to different alphabets were represented. The manuscripts in Nagari and Brahmi alphabets represented two entirely unknown languages, about which Dr. von Le Coq is completely in the dark. "We have not the slightest idea what they are," he said, "but Dr. Muller, the head of the museum, will be able to decipher them, as he did the Manichæan writings."

Buddhistic, historical and juristic manuscripts were also found. The first named are of extraordinary interest, according to the explorer, and relate to religious rites. The bulk of the manuscripts consists of contracts for the sale of land or houses, wine and bread bills and the like. It is anticipated that the investigations of the manuscripts will throw considerable light on the early and middle Persian speech.

One day the excavators stumbled on a cave packed with dead bodies. They were inclosed in short buff leather jerkins and long yellow cloaks—the regulation dress of Buddhist monks. They were evidently bodies of persons massacred either in the cave or elsewhere, and then laid in their last resting-place. Dr. von Le Coq brought a number of the skulls with him. A remarkable thing was that all the bodies, which also included those of other classes, wore Chinese boots.

Da Faith of Aunta Rosa.

YOU know my Aunta Rosa? No?
I weesha dat you could.
She w'at you call "da leevin' saint,"
Baycause she ees so good.
She got so greata, stronga faith
She don'ta nevva care
For doin' anytheeng at all
But justa say her prayer.
She justa pray an' pray an' pray,
An' work so hard at dat
You theenk she would be gettin' theen
Enstead for gat so fat.
Oh, my, she gat so vera fat
Da doctor he ees scare'
An' com' wan day to her an' say:
"You mak' too moocha prayer.
Ees better do som' udder work
An' tak' som' exercise."
My Aunta Rosa shak' her head
An' justa leeft her eyes
An' say, "I gotta faith so strong
Dat I weell jus' baygeen
For pray dat I may lose da fat.
An' soon I weell be theen."
So, den, she justa seet an' pray,
So greata faith she feel,
An' nevva step for anytheeng—
Excep' for taka meal.
An' som' time, too, she seet an' mak'
Da noise so loud an' deep
Eet sounda vera moocha as eef
She prayin' een her sleep.
So Aunta Rosa pray an' pray,
But steell she gat more fat,
So fat she no can walk at all—
Now, w'at you theenka dat?

Mus' be som' troubla een da sky!
Mus' be ees som'theeng wrong,
Baycause eef Aunta Rosa got
Da faith so great an' strong
An' pray so hard dat eet ees all
She gatta time to do
I like som'body tal me why
Her prayer ees no com' true!

Couldn't Wait a Minute.

A Pittsburg man who suddenly acquired riches was desirous of purchasing a fast horse. He went to a dealer, who sold him an animal and guaranteed that he could trot a mile in 2:10. He took his purchase home and the next day drove down to the track to try him. Much to his disgust, the best the horse could do was a mile in 3:10. He returned to the dealer in a rage and said:

"You told me this horse could trot a mile in 2:10. He can't go a mile better than 3:10."

The dealer looked at him a minute and said:

"Well, what of that? Are you in such a terrible hurry you can't wait a minute?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

Trustee's and Administratrix's Sale
OF VALUABLE REAL ESTATE
and Personal Property.

Under and by virtue of a decree of the Circuit Court of Garrett county, Maryland, bearing date the 16th day of February, 1907, and passed in a cause in which Silas Durst Ash and others are plaintiffs, and Mary Ash and others are defendants, the same being No. 1447 Equity, the undersigned Joseph Ash was named in said decree as Trustee with power to sell the real estate therein mentioned, and will on the 15th Day of March, 1907, at 12.30 o'clock P. M., on the premises, offer for sale to the highest bidder the Benjamin Ash Farm and the Improvements Thereon, containing Fifty Acres, a greater part of which is cleared and in cultivation and improved by a dwelling house, stable and other outbuildings.

FRIDAY,

This farm is located about two and one-half miles northeast of McHenry, Garrett county, aforesaid, in a good community, convenient to school and church, and would make a desirable home for some one wanting a small farm.

Terms of sale as prescribed by said decree —One-third cash on the day of sale, one-third in six months and one-third in twelve months from day of sale, the deferred payments to bear interest from day of sale and to be secured to the satisfaction of the Trustee, or all cash at the option of the purchaser. Conveyancing at the cost of purchaser.

And on the same day and at the same place immediately after the sale of the above farm, Mary Ash, Administratrix of Benjamin Ash, deceased, will offer and sell at public sale all the following described personal property, viz:

Two Horses, 3 Cows, 3 Calves, 2 Pigs, 14 Chickens, 1 Two Horse Wagon, 1 Spring Wagon, 2 Sleds, 1 Mowing Machine, 1 Hay Rake 3 Plows and other Farming Implements; 100 Bushels of Oats, 12 Bushels Buckwheat, 8 Tons of Hay, 25 Bushels of Potatoes, 1 Barrel of Cider, Cooking Stove, Heating Stove, Sewing Machine, Spinning Wheels, Chairs, Cupboard and other Household Furniture.

Terms of sale of personal property—All sums under $10 cash; all sums over $10 a credit of six month will be given, the purchaser giving his or her interest bearing note with security satisfactory to the Administratrix; no property to be removed until terms of sale are complied with.

JOSEPH ASH, Trustee.
MARY ASH, Administratrix of Benj. Ash, deceased.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44-5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

Notice of Condemnation Proceedings.

No. 136 Miscellaneous Docket. In the Circuit Court for Garrett County.

The County Commissioners of Garre County v. Joseph M. Crim, Edwar Crim and Mattie Crim his wife, Calvin Crim and Clara Crim his wife, William Crim and Annie Crim his wife, George Crim and Nellie Crim his wife, Ida Crim and E. J. Crim her husband, Minnie Menhorn and John Menhorn her husband, Fannie Nogle and Daniel Nogle her husband, Elizabeth Crim, William R. Offutt and J. C. Renninger, Trustees; George D. white and Alfred G. Sturgiss.

To Edward Crim and Mattie Crim his wife, Calvin Crim and Clara Crim his wife, William Crim and Annie Crim his wife, George Crim and Nellie Crim his wife, Ida Crim and E. J. Crim her husband, Fannie Nogle and Daniel Nogle her husband, and Elizabeth Crim, owners of Lot No. 44 in the town of Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland, and hereinafter particularly described.

You are hereby notified that the County Commissioners for Garrett County have applied to the Honorable Robert R. Henderson, one of the Judges for the Circuit Court for Garrett County, Maryland, for a warrant to be directed to the Sheriff of said Garrett County requiring him to summon a jury to condemn the property hereinafter mentioned and described, and that in accordance with said application the said warrant was on the fourth day of February, 1907, directed to the said Sheriff as will fully appear in said proceedings the same being No. 136 Miscellaneous in the Circuit Caurt for Garrett County; and you are hereby notified that on the twenty third day of February 1907, at the hour of ten o'clock a. m. an inquisition will be held on the land and premises hereinafter particularly described in the town of Oakland, Garrett County, Maryland, at the suit of the County Commissioners for Garrett County, against you and others to condemn a certain piece or parcel of ground and the improvements and material thereon as is necessary for the use and occupation in perpetuity of said County Commissioners for the following public purposes, to-wit: for the erection thereon of a new court house building for Garrett County, for grounds for the same, and for the use of conveying the prisoners from the County jail over and through said lot to the said court house, and for the purpose of running steam, water and sewerage pipes through said lot from the said proposed court house to the said jail for the purposes thereof: and for sufficient grounds and way from said court house to said jail for a walk to said jail way, and for other necessary purposes set forth in said petition; and that upon said inquisition at said time and place a jury of said county summoned by the Sheriff of said county will find whether or not the condemnation of such land, buildings or materials is necessary and proper for the use of said county for the due exercise and enjoyment of its corporate privileges as hereinbefore set forth; and will justly and impartially value the damages which you and the other owners will sustain by reason of the use and occupancy of said land, buildings and materials, in perpetuity. The said County Commissioners having been unable to agree with Joseph M. Crim, one of the said owners, upon the purchase price of said property, and that you are nonresidents of Garrett county, Md., in which said land so wanted lies.

Said land so wanted and to be condemned is described as follows, to-wit: Being all that lot of ground in the town of Oakland, Garrett county, Maryland, and known and designated as Lot No. 44 in said town as shown on the plat filed by McCarty and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 2, folio 513, one of the Land Records of said Garrett county, Maryland, beginning for the same at the first line of Lot No. 40 on said plat, and running thence South 67 degrees East 5 perches, North 23 degrees East 8 perches, North 67 degrees West 5 perches, and then by a straight line to the beginning, containing ¼ of an acre more or less. This being the same property described in a deed from John M. Davis et al., Trustees, to Mary Jane Crim dated the 5th day of May, 1877, and recorded in Liber W. H. T. No. 3, folio 223, &c, one of the Land Records of Garrett county, Maryland.

That the said lot is necessary and proper to be condemned for the use of said county for the public purposes as aforesaid, and is necessary and proper as well as each and every part of said lot for the use of said court house, jail, grounds and the purposes aforesaid.

You are therefore notified that said inquisition will be held at the aforesaid time and place for the purposes aforesaid and to be present if you see fit, in person or by attorney, and to take such action in the premises as you may be advised or may see proper.

THE REPUBLICAN.

VOLUME 30. OAKLAND, MARYLAND, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1907. NUMBER 52

THREE MEMBERS OF CITY COUNCIL TO BE ELECTED.

Nominating Convention Called for Next Wednesday Evening at 7.30 O'Clock.

The voters of Oakland, in response to the notice of election printed in this paper today will be called upon on Monday, March 11th, to elect three members of the Town Council, to take the places of three retiring members in that body whose terms of office will expire on the first day of April next.

In order that the Republicans may nominate a ticket for Councilmen Chairman A. G. Sturgiss of the County Committee has suggested that the Republican voters meet on Wednesday evening next at 7.30 o'clock at the Council Chamber for the purpose of placing a ticket in the field.

It is necessary that as many voters as possible be present at the meeting and that a ticket composed of the best men of the town be named. There is plenty of material from which to make a selection and we trust that a full attendance of the voters be at the meeting and take part.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. MARY GILPIN.

Died, at her home in Loch Lynn Heights on Saturday, February 23rd, after a short illness, Mrs. Mary Gilpin, widow of the late Amos Gilpin, who preceeded her to the grave about a year ago. Mrs. Gilpin leaves two daughters. Her funeral took place on Monday afternoon from the Loch Lynn United Brethren church, the services being in charge of Rev. Westfall, pastor of the Mountain Lake Park M. E. church of which she was a member.

MRS. CATHARINE T. CRANE.

On February the 15th inst. all that was mortal of Mrs. Catharine Townshend-Crane was laid to rest in the Oakland cemetery. Such is in brief, the closing of a busy and useful life.

Mrs. Crane before her marriege, Catharine Townshend, was reared in Oakland, and throughout life made herself a woman of blessed memory. Like Dorcas of old she is remembered by the deeds which she did. Her life was filled up in helping others.

When in Oakland she was a faithful worker in the M. E. church, and in Parkersburg, W. Va., where was spent the latter part of her life, was as consistent in the Presbyterian church, into whose fellowship she entered with her husband on removing to that city.

The funeral services were held in the Oakland M. E. church in the presence of a large assemblage. Rev. J. B. Workman of the M. E. church, opened the services with prayer; Rev J. A. McClelland of the Presbyterian church, read the Scriptures and spoke briefly, followed by the venerable Rev. J. M. Davis, who spoke touchingly of Mrs. Crane's life work.

Mrs. Crane walked in the fear of the Lord blamelessly. She will be missed by all who knew her, but "the righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance."

Mrs. Crane leaves to mourn her immediate loss, a husband and one son, besides a large circle of friends where she was known. J. A. McC.

SMITH'S MARCH FORECAST

West Virginia's Prognosticator Foretells the Weather for Next Month.

March is usually a blustery month, attended by quick changes in temperature and storms of a dangerous character, especially in several of the southern states and also on the gulf and Atlantic coasts. Middle sections of the country will not be entirely free from the winter storm. The storm wave starting at the close of February is likely to be reinforced by exciting causes and continue the disturbance to the 5th or 6th and then be followed by a cold wave. The disturbance will turn from the north after starting with rain, then sleet and snow. The wave will be of wide extent and cover most of the country in some form of disturbance. A warm wave will usher in a storm period on the 10th or 11th. This period borders on the equinoxial phase of disturbance which as a general rule brings severe gales on both land and sea, earth currents become more active and often denote this form of disturbance with fearful results at the equinoxial period. On or touching the 14th the temperature will become warm and storms will be in process of formation which will enter upon their transit on the 15th. Electricity will accompany most of the clouds. The disturbance will be of general extent, reaching mostly all parts of the country. At the final winding up of this period snow and more winter will materialize. A warm wave will be felt on or touching the 20th, 21st and 22d, when rain, sleet and snow will be the outcome and a March cold wave will follow. The last storm period of the month will be central on or touching the 27th or 28th and likely to run to the 30. This wave will be of wide and general extent, touching all parts of the country in its transit. The wave will vary in its character of intensity, kind and force with location and latitude, in many portions of the west and north west it will be a winter blizzard, the cold wave following will spread over much of the country.

War Relics Found in a Log.

While sawing a large oak log on a tract of timber land west of Hagerstown, George Beard made an unusual discovery in a hole in the log that was about 30 feet up from the ground when the tree was standing. In the hole was a brass plate containing the name in cut-out letters of D. Quigley, Company F, One Hundred and Nineteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers. With the plate were some old documents, but they were practically destroyed by age and their contents could not be learned. It is believed the papers and plate were placed in the hole of the tree by a Union soldier, doubtless a sharpshooter or spy, during the Civil War.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

In the Orphans' Court held on Tuesday with Judges Wilson, McMillan and Feik sitting and Registrar Friend present the following business was transacted:

The last will and testament of Henry Stark, deceased, was admitted to probate and the executor therein named, John H. Stark, qualified as such.

The fourth account of Frederick Gortner and others, was passed.

JURY OF CONDEMNATION GAVE CRIM HEIRS $2800

For Property on Alder Street Wanted as a Site for New Court House.

Last Saturday the jury of condemnation summoned by direction of the Court to hear testimony and assess the value of the Crim property located on Alder street, which is required by the County Commissioners as a site for the proposed new court house, met and after viewing the land and buildings thereon adjourned to the court house where witnesses were heard and arguments made in the case, returning a verdict late in the evening awarding the owners $2800.

The property consists of a lot facing eighty-seven and one-half feet on Alder street and running back 135 feet to an alley, upon which is erected a two-story dwelling and a stable. The property was owned by Mrs. Joseph Crim at the time of her death and then reverted to her husband and children.

Some twenty-five witnesses were examined during the proceedings, all of whom testified as to the value of the property, some placing it as low as $2000 and others as high as $3500.

During the hearing of the evidence a paper was produced which was in form of an agreement made by the elder Crim and the Board of County Commissioners, whereby the former agreed to sell the property to the Commissioners for the sum of $2400. Mr. Crim being but one of the heirs the paper was not binding upon the others.

The general opinion of those considered judges of the true value of Oakland real estate is that the price awarded by the jury is equitable and just.

Steel Pullmans for B. & O.

Pullman sleeping cars with the latest type of steel underframes and bracing, the most modern cars of the Pullman company outside of the all-steel Pullman car now on exhibition at Chicago, have been received and placed in the service on Baltimore and Ohio trains out of Pittsburg. There are four of the new cars, each with 16 sections. They are used on trains 10 and 9 between Pittsburg and Baltimore and on trains 105 and 104 between Pittsburg and Cincinnati. General Passenger Agent Austin of the Baltimore and Ohio, when asked for his opinion about the allsteel Pullman sleeping car that he had examined the sample car at Chicago and though it the best type that has ever been turned out.

"One would not know it was materially different from the usual Pullman sleeper," said Mr. Austin, "but an examination shows that it is a decided improvement. I an confident that the car will be approved by all. There is no reason why the cars should not be produced and placed in service by the Pullman people."

MARRIED.

SYPOLT—MICHALLS.—At the Presbyterian Manse by Rev. J. A. McClelland, on the 20th inst., Junior Reed Sypolt and Ida M. Michalls, both of Terra Alta, West Va.

Mr. D. E. Bolden spent Tuesday in Keyser and Cumberland on business.

MRS. ELIZABETH BALDWIN KILLED AT BLOOMINGTON

Lady Was Walking Over Bridge at That Point and Was Struck by Train.

Mrs. Elizabeth Baldwin wife of Mr. Nile Baldwin, residing at West Virginia Junction, just east of Bloomington, this county, was killed by Baltimore and Ohio accommodation train No. 6 on the Bloomington bridge Tuesday morning.

Mrs. Baldwin was crossing the bridge, walking along the west bound track when the train which struck her approached from the rear, having been shifted from its proper track to the one opposite so as to avoid a freight blockade that had taken place. Her death was instantaneous, the engine having struck her in the head and threw her to one side.

As soon as possible after the accident the train was stopped and the remains of the unfortunate lady were taken to Piedmont where they were prepared for burial by an undertaker.

Mrs. Baldwin was 52 years of age and is survived by her husband and several children, among them being Mr. J. C. Baldwin, a brakeman in the employ of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

WOMEN WILL BE MANNISH THIS YEAR.

Fantastic Shapes of Women's Wearables Seen in the Local Stores.

American women will look peculiar this year, if what a local dealer in feminine wearables says is true. To a reporter, he said many of the gowns now arriving resembled masculine garb, so we may look for masculine looking women. Continuing, the dealer said:

"The long jackets, almost mannish in character and line, are not so much the vogue as last year. Those that have appeared to take their places are of most fantastic shapes, and so varied in form that each of us can find one suited to her figure.

"There are the Empire jackets, of rather indefinite form, slightly curved up in the back, well above the belt; the Directoire jackets with the large revers; other long jackets with materials so arranged with lengthwise seams as to give variety and novelty, thanks to which we receive new effects in outline and hang of a garment.

"All sorts of striped cloths are used now for costumes of this kind; many are in two-toned stripes, about one-sixth of an inch wide, of very decided stripes in black and violet or brown and gray. The advantage of these unusual materials is that they can be used in so many different ways and one avoids the deplorable commonplace which so quickly transforms into an obnoxious uniform what was a charming novelty.

"To make the waist and as fastenings there are buttons of velvet, or crocheted in the same color as the cloth.

"In the back the new jackets are made with panels; the material forms a chevron the length of the back seam; it outlines a fichu-shaped stole laid across the bias fronts. One can hardly believe to what a degree the dividing of the materials aids in reducing the apparent size of a waist not slim.

"Crocheted drops, soutache, buttons and all the highest art of the passementerie and embroidery maker are contributed to decorate the corners of the collar, the cuffs on the sleeves, and are repeated on both sides of the vest.

"The effect of these is by no means disagreeable on certain models when they are arranged with some meaning and not stuck on haphazard.

"Jackets of cloth, or of serge alone, have the revers and the vests either striped or checked, while the jackets in plaids or stripes are simply trimmed with bands or straps.

"One still sees long fitted jackets of coat cloth, or with large revers, and displaying various trimmings, which may for a small vest or outline a short bolero. This is only good when the trimmings match in tone the material. It is necessary to renounce absolutely gaudy pipings, bright stitchings, or ideas for buttons of another shade, which clash disagreeably with the color scheme and always have a crimson appearance.

"The sleeves remain short or half length, embroidered on the cuffs, some closed all around, others very much slashed. It is almost unnecessary to add that the cuff trimmings should match that on the jacket; only the collar can be entirely different.

"So we can see that this spring long jackets, fancy coats, short boleros, all should meet with our approval, but there will be nothing that is conventional in their lines. It is the contour of the figure, that the art of the costumer will find its greatest triumph.

REV. HUDSON'S SERMON

Delivered at Deer Park Last Sunday Morning,

It a storm of great severity, a large congregation assembled at the Deer Park Baptist church last Sunday to listen to Rev. C W. Hudson. He delivered an enteresting discourse selecting the 21st verse of the 7th chapter of Matthew on which to base his remarks.

Mr. Hudson told his hearers that he considered this sermon of our Lord and Savior the greatest of which we have any record.

"I emphasize one thing," he began, "and that is there is more in christianity than a bare profession. A good many people imagine that if their names are on the church book that their salvation is assured. I have discovered this, that a great many people who profess to be christians, are not so; that a great may whose names are on the church book are not christian; many are self deceived; they think they are saved when they are not, basing their salvaon the fact that they are members of some christian church. Let us look at a man who unites with a church. He says he wants to unite. He is received by that church according to the way, it receives members. How does he live? He thinks, perhaps, that being a member of that church will save him. I do not think that any of you think that. After a little while we finds that this man is not living the life he ought to live; there has been no change in his relationship to the world. The Scripture tell us we must come out and be separated from the world; a line of distinction must be made. He makes no line of distinction; he is not depending upon his faith to save him; he is not depending upon the righteousness of Jesus Christ to save him, but upon the church, and he becomes careless; he does not seem to think there is anything incumbent upon him at all, except that he observe the rules of the church to a certain extent."

Adverting to the recent tradgy at Friendsville, the minister said: "Who is responsible for the murder of Truman Root? Who is responsible that his widow and little children should now be in want for something to eat? The man who sold the liquor is responsible, but that liquor dealer could not have gotten his license, but for those men who voted in favor of it. Beloved, I want you to think of these things down there at Friendsville. Pray for them that the Lord may save them; may pardon their sins. Those of you whose names are written on some church book, never, under any circumstances, do anything that will bring shame upon the name of Jesus Christ or upon that faith which you profess." G. W. ## GREAT REVIVAL MEETING STILL IN PROGRESS.

One Hundred aud Thirteen Conversions Accredited to the Special Effort.

The great revival meeting which has been in progress in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal church in Oakland for the past six weeks, is still working wonders for the cause of Christianity.

Up to this time the net results of the efforts put forth by Pastor Workman and the members of his and other congregations who have joined in the movement, has been the conversion of one hundred and thirteen souls and the reclamation of scores who had lagged in church work.

Last Friday afternoon Dr. Davis, of the Park, addressed a special meeting for ladies and girls. The service was well attended and much interest was manifested in the meeting. Special music was a feature of the gathering and Dr. Davis talk struck many responsive cords in his audience.

Sunday afternoon another special meeting for men and boys was held, at which as at the Friday afternoon meeting, Dr. Davis was the speaker. The church was well filled with the men and youth of the town. Dr. Davis based his remarks on I Sam. 10:22, "Behold, he has hid himself among the stuff." The speaker sought to impress his auditors with the fact that when called to perform a service for God none should attempt to hid; but that everyone should devote his talents to the service of God and in that manner help his weaker brother to gain strength spiritually.

ONCE IN 2,500,000 YEARS.

A February Without a Full Moon is a Great Rarity.

A remarkable freak in moon phases was noted in the month of February, 1866, a month which has gone into astronomical annals as "the month without a full moon." In that year January and March each had two full moons, but February none. A writer in a lead-astronomical journal uses the following langurge in describing it: "Do you realize what a rare thing in nature it was? It has not happened before or since the beginning of the Christian era, or probably since the creation of the world. It will not occur again according to the computations of the astronomer royal of England, for—how long do you think? Not until after 2,500,000 years from 1866."

Senator W. McCulloh Brown, of Baltimore, was in Oakland last Saturday attending the condemnation court as a witness.

Abraham Pleading For Sodom.

Under the grateful shade of the oaks of Mamre the patriarch's camp was pitched. It stretched afar; for his vast flocks and herds required an army of attendants. Under the crimson folds of the sheik's pavilion, on her rich divan, the venerable Princess Sarah reclined, while at its silked portico the centenarian Abraham rested in the heat of the day. Perhaps he was indulging in the pleasures of memory, and was back again in thought on the banks of the Euphrates—now at Ur, where God first called him; or at Charran and his father's grave; or perhaps he was treading once more the banks of the Euphrates's great rival, the Nile; or he was looking down the long vista of the future, and wondering when the blissful promise, of which he was heir, should be fulfilled. . . . His reverie was suddenly broken by the approach of strangers. At once there was a sensation in camp. The monotony incident to pastorial life was broken by its chief and most welcome diversion, the arrival of a passing traveler. In that age before post and newspaper, this was the chief means of communication with the outside world. This was how the nomadic tribes heard of the rise and fall of monarchies and kingly projects in war or peaceful arts of commerce and architecture. We have an analogy to it in modern times in the welcome arrival of the pioneer preacher at a "clearing" in log-cabin days. He brought more than theology in his saddle-bags. . . . Literature does not contain a more naive and fascinating bit of Oriental life. We fairly see the patriarch running to greet his guests with profuse Eastern salutations—adroitly making himself their debtor in that they allow him to entertain them; courteously discounting in advance what he proffer them, "a little water," "a morsel of bread." In an incredibly short space of time the appetizing meal is spread—a roast of veal, with butter and milk and delicious cakes baked by Sarah's own deft hand—and Abraham stands to serve. . . . From the very first Abraham may have had an inkling of the supernatural character of his visitors. The hour of their arrival was so unusual; no one travels in the East in the heat of the day. But whether the host suspected it or not, the guests soon cast off all disguises and Abraham knew that he was entertaining the Lord and his two attendant angels. . . . They were bearers of a blessing and a curse. A blessing to righteous Abraham—the blissful assurance that the long-delayed advent of His promised son was near at hand. Here is a glimpse at the ministry of the holy angels. These two were possibly rewarded for fidelity by being allowed to see Abraham's face when the good news was broken to him. And if angels attended the Lord on this errand, why may they not be going with him on others, or going for him? . . . While Abraham, with courtly hospitality and grace, was going a pace with departing guests, the Lord revealed the curse to him. Excess of joy over the blessing was tempered by grief over the impending curse, and vice versa. It was natural God should tell Abraham of what would befall Sodom. Proximity would suggest it. Then, too, the patriarch had fought for the Sodomites, and his nephew dwelt among them. . . . But this vitally important information would never have been given to any human being of less exalted character than the patriarch possessed. This is the plain inference from the words with which the revelation is prefaced. The very fact that he was worthy to be chosen the progenitor of the chosen race signified that he was worthy to be the Lord's confidant. The greater included the less. "Why, indeed, should the thing be hidden?" By this very act of confidence the Lord lifted Abraham, as he intended to, from the plane of servitude to that of friendship. The servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth, but the form, so he also accommodated himself to the fashion of human speech, and described himself as on the way to make a personal investigation of the wickedness of Sodom—to see whether the reality of it was as great as the fame of it—and thus qualify himself to pass judicial sentence, all of which was of the nature of anthropomorphism. . . . As the angel trio started on their dread mission, Abraham's generous, compassionate heart prompted him to throw himself between the Lord and the doomed cities. All unconsciously he makes himself a striking type of the great Intercessor of the race. He prays for sinners. Their awful fate touched his heart to pity. He had once gone to battle for them; now he goes to his knees in their behalf. He is a daysman, a mediator. With comsummate skill he handles their desperate case. "Shall this be a wholesale slaughter? Will there not be a discrimination between the good and the bad? Might not the sparing of the bad on account of the presence of the good among them have a striking, exemplary influence? If so, what shall be the ratio between the good and the bad? Might it not be as many as fifty to the whole population? Or (with extreme depreciation of himself as an intercessor) forty-five? or forty or thirty? or twenty? or ten. . . . Abraham displayed no "bargaining temper, striving only to get the best possible terms," but was climbing the ladder of hope and faith, and with each promise taking courage to ask for more. When he felt that he had reached the uttermost verge of Divine forbearance, then only he rested his case, and returned unto his place with mingled emotions—joy at the blessing that should soon be his; grief at the curse that should next day fall upon the cities of the plain.

The Teacher's Lantern.

From various angles Abraham has been viewed in the preceding narrative: as a pilgrim; as prince of a growing tribe; in war; in worship; receiving promises; entering into a covenant; but here he appears in an entirely new capacity—in the lovely and holy office of intercessor. Picture the disinterested quality of his intervention on the part of the Sodomites; compassion for the erring was his chief motive. "Here is the first great outstanding instance of intercessory prayer in Scripture. Abraham is here a type of Him who "ever lives to intercede."

* * * * *

The duty, privilege, value, importance, efficacy of intercessory prayer, here has a striking exemplification. We are here encouraged to pray for our fellow-creatures en masse. Much of our prayer is too circumscribed. It is selfishly personal. It abounds in personal pronouns. It may well be satirized by the prayer ascribed to the hide-bound deacon. "Lord bless me and my wife, my son John and his wife; us four and no more. Amen."

* * * * *

Setting ourselves to study the condition and needs of others, masses, classes, individuals, and to present them in petition at the mercy-seat, has its reflex advantage in broadened sympathies. Richest blessings often come to us not when we are praying for ourselves, but for others.

* * * * *

The value to the world of the good people who are in it here has a conspicuous illustration. They are the salt that saves it. There are things that God might do to the world which He does not do because of the presence of His saints. These are ever increasing in number, so the world grows proportionately safer. "Never again will the poverty of the world in righteous men be so as in the case of Sodom."

* * * * *

The modern fascination for city life has a remarkable analogy in the case of Lot. He must live in a city, even if it is only Zoar!

* * * * *

That Banquo's Ghost, the city problem, will "up" in this lesson. Within the lifetime of some readers the population of the cities of this country will equal its entire present population; and De Tocqueville affirmed that the cities are a real danger threatening the Republic.

AVERAGE STATE LEGISLATURE.

The legislature couldn't make one good law in three months, let alone three thousand, without turning in some direction for aid and counsel. Our well-meaning farmers and grocerymen and manufacturers are probably endowed with that profound ignorance of basic problems which comes out in the form of a loud contempt for "science" and "theory." But now they are, in the language of the committee room, up against it. They have got to make three thousand laws in three months, without much of an idea, in some cases, of what the blesssd things are all about. A good many of our farming and manufacturing friends would really like to make good laws; but probably not one of them is competent to draw a bill that will hold together. To make it worse, these laws, good or bad, will come down forcibly on every man, woman and child in the state.

In view of this fact—that the legislature, made up of bungling, good-hearted amateurs, with a leavening of crooks, is bound to turn out just about so many laws anyway—do we citizens, the real "interests" most vitally affected by the mass of legislation, take any adequate measures either to put in abler men, or to supply accurate and thoroughgoing information as a basis for the legislation? Not at all. We send our legislators down to the capital, and go on serenely vague, about what we like to call "our business." The snail's on the thorn. God's in His heaven, all's right with the world! And meanwhile the attorneys for the railroad and the "pnblic service" company, and the big brewers and manufacturers are drawing up bills which our farming friends don't understand, and are crowding them through with doubtful statistics and specious reasoning which our farming friends may question, but which they have neither the time nor the resources to dispute.—Success Magazine.

WELCOMED BY THE PRESIDENT

Eli Smith, the Alaskan Mail Carrier and His Team of Dogs in Washinton.

The Washington Post, February 21, printed the following interesting story:

Travel-stained and leg-weary from his 8,000 mile transcontinental jaunt, Eli Smith, Alaskan mail carrier, with his team of seven Eskimo dogs, drove into the inclosure surrounding the White House grounds yesterday afternoon and was informally and democratically greeted by President Roosevelt, Archie, Quentin, and several Executive office attaches.

Thus the sturdy son of the frozen North ended with a Presidential handshake his much-heralded journey, begun in faraway Nome more than a year ago.

As if by magic the news of the arrival of the traveler, whose unique journey has led him across the American continent, traversed the White House and into the adjoining State, War and Navy Department building. In the twinkling of an eye officials, clerks and a host of curious uchins and passing pedestrians were craning their necks to witness the unusual sight of an Eskimo dog team being driven up the driveway to the portico of the White House.

As the mail carrier called out "Whoa" to his dogs, he was immediately surrounded by a crowd, intent on knowing the details of his trip and plying him with miscellaneous questions. Little Quentin, the White house baby, clambered onto the low, sled-like cart, which has served as Smith's conveyance, and encircled the driveway, while Archie grasped mail carrier's horny hand in a friendly, boyish greeting. In this attitude both the White House boys were snapped by several amateur photographers.

At the President's suggestion, Smith withdrew his team to the rear of the White House, away from the gaze of the curious, and a few minutes later the two, one the Nation's Executive, and the other, roughly-clad and storm-tossed, met for an interview in the President's private office.

Smith presented to the President a letter of introduction from an official at Nome and in return the President wrote a brief note certifying Smith's arrival at the Capital. After a brief conversation, in which Secretary Loeb and Attorney General Bonaparte joined, they adjourned to the rear of the White House, where Smith put his dogs through their paces.

The President laughed heartily at the exhibition, and all present, particularly the boys, Archie and Quentin seemed to enjoy the sight.

Leaving the White House grounds by the east gate, the team trotted briskly by the south front of the Treasury, much to the enjoyment of the clerks who crowded to the wtndows, up Fifteen street and along F street to Eleventh, where Smith,s "Whoa!" brought the team to a stop.

As the strange outfit moved along the crowded thoroughfare, the expert mail-carrier, by a chorus of "Whoas!" guiding it in and out between teams and cars, all business seemed to stop for the moment. Customers and clerks ran to the curbs, waving a friendly greeting to the travel-stained stranger and his dog companions, and even the sphinx-like motormen, absorbed in watching the odd team, forgot to clang their ear-splitting gongs.

Smith is a typical son of the plains. Standing about five feet eight inches in height, his unusual breadth of shoulders marks him as a man of unusual strength. Though his long journey was for the most part over and through a country rough of fatigue and contact with cold and storm seeming to have inured him to hardship.

He wore a blue shirt, such as is seen in the army, and over it a vest, but was minus a coat. His stout trousers were of rough material and his hands were encased in a pair of heavy fur-lined gloves.

On his feet he wore rubber shoes of arctic design, while his headcovering was a thick cap with ear-flaps.

He speaks with a broad accent, typical to the West, and his references to his remarkable trip are made with the modesty of a man accustomed to the rougher paths of life.

"I dropped twenty pounds on the trip," he remarked with a smile, as he trotted down F street alongside his dogs. "Sometimes when the trail was bad," he added, "I got off the sled and took the part of the eighth dog. Your streets here are better than I've been used to."

The seven faithful dogs attracted a large portion of the attention as they passed along, little disconcerted by the crowd of yelling urchins. Three of the dogs, Smith tells are tame wolves, while four are of the pure domesticated Eskimo breed. All seven, despite their former wild life and surroundings are remarkably docile. They evince a great fondness for their master, and show an intelligent understanding of his commands.

Although petted by scores of unfamiliar hands, none of the animals either showed their teeth or indicated a belligerent desire to "mix it up" with several Washington dogs that, out of curiousity, followed in their wake through the streets.

A wager of $10,000 is the reward which Smith says was held out to him to make the journey. The wager, he tells was made with E. J. Pierce, of Nome. Smith left Nome November 14, 1905, and according to the terms of his bet is two months and eight days ahead of time.

Altogether, he has been on the road one year three months, and six days. From Nome he went to Seattle, Wash., and from that city he drove and walked across the country to Milwaukee, Wis. Leaving Milwaukee last September, he crossed the intervening states passing through Cumberland last Thursday, and thence to Frederick and Gaithersburg, reaching the latter place Tuesday night.

BIG BUSINESS OF RAILROADS

The Growth of Traffic Has Been Enormous, Almost Beyond Computation.

The enormous growth of railroad business in this country is more or less familiar to the public, but only in a general way. It is therefore particularly interesting and timely to consider the increase in the case of a single transportation company, and this opportunity of study is afforded by the final report of the special committee of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., which was appointed in May last to examine into and report facts concerning the acquisition by officers or employes of stock or other interest in other corporations which could affect their duty to the railroad company or its duty to the public. The report deals with many facts relating to the business of the Pennsylvania Railroad, but the data particularly of interest in relation to the growth of traffic is that showing the expansion of the company, which is typical of other railroad corporations.

The report says that the period between 1899 and 1907 will be memorable in the road's history. In 1899 the Pennsylvania faced a growing traffic, inadequate receipts and increased cost of operation. To provide adequate facilities and lessen the cost while increasing efficiency expenditures upon an unexampled scale had to be made, and the money had to be provided for so much of those expenditures as was charged to capital. Thus from 1899 to 1905, inclusive, the total share capitalization of the several companies was increased from $251,662,176 to $485,917,321. The large expenditures to meet increased requirements are shown by statements that $62,703,367 were spent for real estate to be used as right of way for additional lines and extensions, yards, terminals and stations. Renewals of road, yards, terminals and buildings were made on a greater scale and more substantially than ever before at a cost of $160,720,289, all charged to operating expenses. New construction cost $268,773,763, of which $140,171,167 was charged to income and $98,505,592 to capital, the rest being taken from profit and loss. An adequat description of the new construction would, it is said, require a volume, but the most important was the double-tracking of the Western lines finished on the Fort Wayne division and in progress on the panhandle division; also the extension, both east and west, of automatic signals, the completion of a four-track line practically all the way from New York to Pittsburg and the building of branch lines as feeders. For a large part of the distance between New York and Pittsburg a double-track freight line, independent of the four-track line, is also provided. Besides this, grades and curves were reduced and eliminated, grade crossings were done away with, and much other work, such as the building of bridges, tunnels, stations, etc., was also engaged in. During the six and a half years ended June 30, 1906, the cost of material and supplies bought by the purchasing departments was $412,409,698.

The increase in the volume of business is shown thus: The tons of freight moved one mile increased from 18,848,947,142 to 32,250,172,703, or over 71 per cent., and the passengers carried one mile increased from 1,875,588,476 to 3,376,368,992, or over 80 per cent. For the year 1906 the approximate earnings were, from passengers, $67,365,392; from freight, $202,616,535; total, $260,981,947. It may be noted that during the same period the population of the country increased about 15 to 17 per cent. The increased volume of this business made necessary an increase in the number of officers and employes from 125,725 to 198,930. Since 1900 two advances of 10 per cent. each were made in the pay of all employes whose wages were less than $200 a month. The increased volume of business also necessitated large increases in equipment. Thus the number of engines increased from 4813 to 6029, with an increase in tractive power from 73,199,933 to 166,082,441, altogether 2553 engines having been built or rebuilt at a cost of $60,551,481. There were also 122,718 freight cars built or rebuilt at a cost of $124,841,319, the increase in capacity being 4,927,122 tons. There were also 1741 passenger cars built or rebuilt at a cost of $10,413,746, making a total expenditure for new equipment of $195,806,547.

Thus in the period of six and a half or seven years under consideration the Pennsylvania Railroad spent a total of $1,100,503,664 for real estate renewals, new construction, materials, supplies and equipment—that is, over eleven hundred millions of dollars to enlarge its capacity for doing business. This was done by only one system, and reflection upon the magnitude of other systems, not to mention many small lines throughout the country, may give to the reader a faint conception of the vastness of the sums which are being spent by railroad corporations to keep pace with the demands of commerce and industry.

UPON WHAT MEAT DOES A CONGRESSMAN FEED?

A labored and general attempt has been made to justify the recent increase of the salaries of Congressmen from $5,000 to $7,500. The reason advanced for the increase is the great cost of living in Washington. The average time that a Congressman is employed in Washington is five months in the year. The contention that a Congressman can not live on $1,000 a month is absurd. In addition to his pay, the Congressman gets his mileage, which is far more than sufficient to pay his necessary traveling expenses. It is safe to say that a great majority of the members of the House do not spend half of $5,000 during the session. The Congressman does not abandon his regular business. It may be interrupted for a time, but that is all. It is likely that there are very few ministers of the Gospel in Washington who receive as much as $5,000 a year and there are few lawyers or physicians or teachers who make as much. The Government clerk who gets as much as $2,000 is the exception. The ordinary pay is from $1,200 to $1,600, upon which they must support their families. All officers of the army and navy under the rank of brigadier-general and rear-admiral have to get along with less than $5,000 a year. Upon what meat does a Congressman feed, that he should require so much more to live upon than other people? In some high official places there must be much entertaining, but this is not the case with Congressmen. There are thousands of men and women employed by the Government who are grossly underpaid. But the Congressmen were not in that class.

THOMAS PARRAN.

The reference in the Calvert Gazette, of Prince Frederick Town, Md., to the Hon. Thomas Parran as a candidate for Governor on the Republican ticket deserves special notice and comment. The evolution and advancement of the Republican party in Maryland since the Civil War has been more remarkable than that of the party in any of the other so classed Southern States. To-day in the quality of the public men it has brought forth and in the quantity, intellectuality and substance of its followers or adherents it stands the peer if not the superior of the Democratic party in the state.

As the party has thus advanced in importance and influence it has been more careful in selecting its candidates for public office. This fact is shown conspicuously in the latter day choice of the candidates for the exalted office of Governor. All the people were exceedingly proud of Governor Lloyd Lowndes and would have been equally gratified with Stephenson A. Williams had he been allowed to take the Governorship to which he had been fairly elected.

The Hon. Thomas Parran, Clerk to the Court of Appeals of Maryland, possesses qualifications that fully meet the demands of a most exacting party for its candidate for Governor.

He is well and most favorably known all over the State and has hosts of personal friends from Garrett to Somerset. He knows the people and their needs thoroughly. He has a genuine love for the people and his State and wherever he has made a public address his enthusiasm and eloquence upon the subject "Maryland" has infected the people.

He has fine executive ability and he is thoroughly trusted and relied upon in the councils of his party as a statesman possessed of bread practical views. Personally he is most charming, possessing all those qualities of mind and heart that dignify and adorn human nature and make the gentleman.

Mr. Parran's chances to win the election, if nominated for Governor are above par. This statement is based upon the idea that he is not less popular than he was in 1901 when he carried the State of Maryland for Clerk of the Court of Appeals by a majority exceeding that of Dr. Herring the democrat, who was then elected Comptroller of the State. In that election Mr. Parran led his ticket in all the five counties of Western Maryland, composing the Sixth Congressional District.

Mr. Parran would be an ideal candidate and an ideal Governor.

GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Some one has said that George Washington lived so long ago and has been discussed so much that nothing more remains to be said concerning him. If the people of every generation differed in their thought, aspirations, ambitions and passions from every other generation more consideration might be given the statement. Since, however, the public life of our country has not always been conducted with that spirit of patriotic unselfishness so characteristic of the life and acts of George Washington, and since many people are accustomed to lay all personal faults to inherited disposition, it may be wise for editors and teachers and public speakers to keep before our young people, and older ones, too, a man who held his own passions in check only by the grip of a cultivated iron will, and who despite the most insistent calls from his private business, put it aside for the public good at a time when so doing put him outside the pale of pardon from the then most powerful nation upon the face of the earth, and at a time, also when the chances were almost overwhelmingly against his ultimate success. It is well to pause on this the anniversary of his natal day and cast up accounts with ourselves and see if we can measure up to the high standard to which he so persistently adhered.

Time softens rugged outlines, and we are apt to minimize the difficulties which confronted this man. The restrospective eyes can now see victory, which to the soundest judgment then spelled defeat. From the illustrations which have come down to us from our school histories of the triumphal processions which greeted the first president of the United States, the flowers, and songs and the hearty greetings, and even in the earlier and darker days of the boat bearing the soldiers across the icy and and tempestuous Delaware and the heroic figure cloaked, erect, with hand on sword, we get but the glory and the grandeur without the thought of interminable worry and heart ache and insinuating figure of dismal failure back of it all. We forget that in the midst of the most engrossing and important constructive public duties he was so harrassed that in desperation he wrote to one of his friends. "I wish that I might die so as to escape this most bitter and unjust criticism." Possibly no president of the United States since that time has been so great a storm center or suffered so much from malicious attacks. Yet through it all there was the same calm demeanor; the same resolute purpose.

There are but two notable instances in the public life of George Washington when he gave way to the fiery temper with which he was endowed—once at the Battle of Monmouth when reprimanding General Lee for a disgraceful flight and refusal to obey orders, and another less well known incident when all the vials of his wrath was poured upon the head of John Marshall, who refused to run for congress from Virginia, because of private business reasons. Marshall reconsidered his decision, and entered upon that larger public life which resulted in such happy effect to our nation.

George Washington was a man, subject to the frailties of mankind, and lived at a time when the grosser passions of mankind ran riot, but search the pages of history and of private correspondence in vain for a low reference or a note unworthy of a private gentleman or a public official.

Keeping in mind these splendid qualities of the man is it any wonder that public exercises are held in our schools on the anniversary of his birth? It it any wonder that though more than a hundred years have passed since he has walked upon the earth, his name and life are yet a fruitful source of discussion?

SENATOR SMOOT NOT EXPELLED.

In the United States Senate on Wednesday the final vote was taken on what has been known as the Burrows resolution to expel Senator Reed Smoot, of Utah, because of his connection with the Mormon Church, and the resolution failed of adoption, 28 Senators voting for and 42 against it. An analysis of the vote shows that 9 Republicans and 19 Democrats voted for the resolution, while but 3 Democrats voted against it, the remaining 39 in the negative being Republicans. So Senator Smoot has not been expelled but will be permitted to serve till the end of his term, which will expire March 4, 1909.

The charge against him has been that as an official of the Mormon Church, his allegiance to that organization is higher than his fealty to his country. A tremendous effort was made to unseat him, especially by many of the women of the country, who were doubtless enlisted against him more on account of their abhorance of polygamy than any other cause. And yet Senator Smoot is not a polygamist. He has never had but one wife. Throughout the trying ordeal to which he was subjected, in the Senate's investigation of the charges against him, he bore himself with a dignity and self-poise well calculated to win the respect of the members of the committee before whom the investigation took place. He showed no animosity or rancor toward his persecutors. He made no show of a wordy defense, but quietly met the allegations against him, averred his fealty to the government of the country over all other allegiance and interests, including the church, and convinced most of those who heard him of his sincerity.

It can hardly be claimed that he stands inimical to the Constitution and laws of the country, or that these make him ineligible to represent his State in the Senate. The body is the judge of the election and qualification of its own members. There was no question of legality of his election. The only point in the case was that of his qualification. His opponents claimed that as a high official of the Mormon Church he was disqualified because they alleged he owed it higher allegiance than he did the country. As this was not proved the Senate properly declined to expel him.

WE CONGRATULATE the Cumberland News which recently installed a perfecting press and other modern machinery which brings its mechanical department up to a standard rarely if ever equalled by any newspaper published in a city of Cumberland's pretensions. The News' building has been considerably enlarged to accommodate the new machinery and the result is that a much better and larger paper can and eventually will be published by the management. Mr. W. W. Brown is president, Mr. Lloyd Lownders vice president and Charles W. Donnelly secretary and treasurer of the corporation controlling the News. We wish the paper and people connected with it continued prosperity.

B. & O. PENSION SYSTEM.

The new pension system of the Baltimore & Ohio, which was to have gone into effect January 1st, has been delayed by the non-completion of the work of gathering data on some divisions of the system necessary before the preliminaries are perfect. Major J. G. Pangborn, who has had charge of the work, has just returned to his headquarters at Baltimore after an extended trip through the northwest, where he spent some time studying the pension systems of other railroads in addition to the work of overseeing the gathering of data for the B. & O. system and is expected to make his final report to President Murray soon.

It is expected that the operation of the system will not be delayed later than March 15th.

THE JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

The fast approaching Exposition to be held, opening April 26th next, on the historic soil of Virginia at the historic Jamestown, on the banks of the no less historic James river, promises to be one of the most phenominal, illustrative, historical and representative of the century. Whilst in one sense of the word it will be a grand State enterprise, it will be a national in its luminous grandeur and proportions, its glaring ann varied advantages, its commercial and industrial utilities, its acheivements in the sciences and arts, and historic picturesqueness. It will be broader and more significant than all this. It will represent the growth, civilization, refinement, progress, customs, manners and dress of every civilized nation under the sun, and even of uncivilized nations. The former will vie with each other in their rich, varied and artistic exhibits. It will be a world's exposition of its progress at a State and National Exposition. It will be also a specular gathering, instructive and patriotic.

It must not be forgotten that England has almost equal interest with us in this great celebration. While we are magnifying our growth from a humble beginning, we are glorifying the English spirit which made even this humble beginning possible, and it is unreasonable to doubt that a Presidential proclamation inviting the nations of the world to send their battleships to visit our port will be received by all nations with pleasure, and with England by acclamation.

It will be remembered that every exposition yet held has been eminently a land show, and although each had incorporated, to a greater or less extent, water decorations, this has been purely an addition to the general plan, and not a great feature. The Jamestown celebration will be dominated by its marine portion, the situation impels this fact, and to a certain extent the Jamestown memorial will be larger than the others because its site will include not only the few hundred acres comprised within its barriers, but one hundred and sixty square miles of Hampton Roads, whose water wash its beach. What a grand sight! Representative battleships from every navy yard of the world

"Walking these waters
Like a thing of life."

Two special reproductions on this water will possess a fascinating interest, each in its way compelling. It has been proposed to have exact copies of the Susan Constant, the Godspeed and the Discovery built, rigged and accoutred like the original three which brought the first colonies. The other spectacle, which will have an interest not only for our countrymen, but for the fighting marine of civilization as a whole, is the reproduction of the Merrimac and Monitor fight, the first contest between ironclads, resulting, as it did, in the destruction of neither vessel.

We are aware that there have been so many expositions that the people have grown tired of them. They have celebrated unimportant events, or they have served purely to exploits certain localities. They have afforded pleasant Meccas for excursionist who desired to be amused. With the exception of the Philadelphia centennial, none of these has appealed with compelling force to the lover of his nation's history and greatness as this will do. Hampton Roads is redolent of history. Hampton Roads, with its fight of the Merrimac and Monitor, which contest inaugarated the era of modern naval construction; Hampton Roads, with its Sewell's Point, its Fortress Monroe, its Rip Raps, and its numberless other famous points.

All the land in this section is hallowed ground. Earthworks or their remains are everywhere in evidence. In a speech, made a few months since, the Governor of Virginia said: "We do not need to search mythology of fables for heroic founders—that Romulus and Remus of the story were outdone by Smith of history. One hundred years before 1907 there was a celebration at Jamestown, but our situation was small among the world's family of States. To-day, occupying an almost hegemonic situation among nations, the event which caused the country and made possible her power is one to draw the gaze and focus the interest of the world."

SWANTON.

We are having quite a heavy snow storm at this writing which our young people will enjoy immensely.

Rev. Johnson commenced his series of meeting in the U. B. church Sunday night. Let the good work go on.

We are sorry to note the serious illness of Mrs. Levi Sweitzer. She and her husband are among the oldest residents of the county. Mr. Sweitzer will be 88 next month and Mrs. Sweitzer is up in seventies.

Miss Hester Bitner and her sister Miss Susan Bitner, of Accident, are visiting their sister, Mrs. Dan Sweitzer, of this place.

Mr. J. Ashenfelter lost a very valuable cow last week.

Miss Mollie Friend and Miss Bessie Shank were guests of Mrs. H. K. Shank last Tuesday evening.

Mr. B. F. Friend, of Mt. Lake Park, was visiting his brothers, Messrs. J. F. and A. G. Friend one day last week.

We are glad to note that Mr. Ollie Sweitzer, who had such a serious time with typhoid fever, is able to be out.

Mr. C. S. Friend, of Piedmont, was visiting his parents, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Friend, on last Sunday.

Mr. A. H. Friend, of Altamont, spent Sunday with his father, Mr. A. G. Friend.

Mr. Cormany Brobst and Miss Carrie West were united in marriage Feb. 24.

Mrs. George McKinzie is still very ill at this writing.

Miss Mollie Schroyer, of Accident, is visiting her grand parents, Mr. and Mrs. Levi Sweitzer.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

Consumption

¶ There is no specific for consumption. Fresh air, exercise, nourishing food and Scott's Emulsion will come pretty near curing it, if there is anything to build on. Millions of people throughout the world are living and in good health on one lung.

¶ From time immemorial the doctors prescribed cod liver oil for consumption. Of course the patient could not take it in its old form, hence it did very little good. They can take and tolerate it for a long time. There is no oil, not excepting butter, so easily digested and absorbed by the system as cod liver oil in the form of Scott's Emulsion, and that is the reason it is so helpful in consumption where its use must be continuous.

¶ We will send you a sample free.

¶ Be sure that this picture in the form of a label is on the wrapper of every bottle of Emulsion you buy.

Mr. Otho J. Paugh, one of our patrons, hailing from near Barnum, made this office an early morning visit Monday.

Dr. H. Scott, remembered by many in Oakland as the pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church until a few years ago, is spending the winter in Florida with his wife and daughter.

Messrs. Alan C. Dodson, of Bethlehem, Pa., and George W. McFarlane, superintendent of mines at Barnum and Dodson, this county, were in Oakland Monday for a few hours looking after some business interests of the coal companies in which they are interested.

The venerable Samuel Ferguson, one of Oakland's oldest and highest respected citizens, has been quite ill for a week or more with an attack of grip and its kindred ailments. His many friends hope for his speedy restoration to health.

Mr. Daniel O. Kimmell, of Shinnston, West Va., where he is employed by the Hope Oil Company as an inspector of wells, spent several days recently in Oakland and the community nearabout. He is a son of Mr. Chauncey Kimmell and went to the Ohio and West Virginia oil fields several years ago.

Mrs. L. L Loar and daughter, Miss Ethel, will leave this evening for Pinehurst, North Carolina, where they will remain a season for the benefit of Miss Ethel's health. The young lady has been in poor health for some time past, her condition necessitating her leaving school at the Buckhannon Seminary early in the winter. It is the hope of all that the trip to North Carolina may greatly benefit her.—Grafton Sentinel.

Clerk John C. Dunham of the City Council, gives notice in this paper today of the municipal election to be held on Monday, March 11th, for the pnrpose of electing three members of the Town Council.

In another column of THE REPUBLICAN today Mr. John W. Williams, of Philadelphia, advertises for sale or rent his property located near Deer Park. The advertisement contains a full description of the buildings and grounds surrounding them.

Mr. Austin Brown, who is interested in the casket and coffin works recently established at Clarksburg, W. Va., will start on the road as the travelling representative of his firm some time early in March. The factory has already made quite a number of shipments of the finished product and a large business is expected te be built up.

A community torn by dissensions, rent asunder by strife and contention—the people ready always to fly at each other's throats on account of rivalry and petty jealousies—can never hope to succeed. The universal brotherhood of man is constantly deferred and the end of time will appear before this great desideratum can be brought about, unless man shall be brought to the realization of this, his dominant, weakness. Let him inquire, "Who is my neighbor?"

Mr. Jesse J. Ashby, Jr., of near Crellin, was in Oakland yesterday afternoon on business when he called to see THE REPUBLICAN. For a year or more Mr. Ashby has had a number of men engaged in developing the coal underlying his farm adjacent to Crellin, recently completing an air shaft of nearly sixty feet deep to afford ventilation to the mine. The heading has been driven about seven hundred feet into the hill and an excellent quality of coal is being mined which finds a ready sale.

Young man, do not take up the study of medicine unless you are morally certain that you are fitted for carving out for yourself a brilliant future in that profession. About 12,500 medical graduates are being turned out by the colleges each year, while there is need of only about 2,500 according to one of our most distinguished practitioners. Better stay at home on the farm, where brain, brawn and energy will always win its own reward. The well-to-do farmer of today is the most independent man on the green footstool.

FOR SALE—Pair young bay horses; weight 2600 pounds; good workers and sound. Apply to C. A. Ashby, Crellin, Md. 4t-paid.

Mrs. R. B. Ward received a message on Tuesday morning conveying the sad intelligence of the sudden death of her mother, Mrs. Metcalf, who died the evening previous at the home of Dr. Ward's brother in Chillicothe, Ohio, where the deceased lady was visiting at the time. Mrs. Ward left Oakland Tuesday evening for Bellaire, Ohio, Mrs. Metcalf's home, to which point the remains were conveyed and where the funeral will take place today. Dr. Ward went to Bellaire yesterday morning. Mrs. Metcalf was well known in Oakland, having made her home here with her daughter several years ago.

The man who makes money in a community has a duty to perform to that community. It may be that he has made his money by his superior business ability, and that he would have done as well anywhere. That does not alter the case. If his gifts are great his responsibility is equally as great. No man was placed on earth for the sole purpose of making money, and the man who has this as his ideal had better never have been born. It is not an act of charity, but the performance of a simple duty for the man who has made money to pass a little of it on for the benefit of the community, even though he never expects to see a dollar of his contribution back.

In every city there are movements which call for the expenditure of money. Some of these are of a distinctly public character, and are paid for through taxation. Others are of a semi-public character, and for them the funds must be raised by voluntary contributions. These must come from the men who are doing the business of the place and who have the money. There is no other way. The man who has the money is the man who must pay the bills, if they are to be paid. Most enterprises of a public nature which have for their object the bettering of conditions, business and otherwise, in a city will, directly or indirectly, return more than the money expended to those who pay it.

THE MOUNTAIN CHAUTAUQUA.

Some of the Events Scheduled for the Assembly in August.

The session of 1907 covers from August 2nd to August 28th. The Silver Jubilee of Mountain Lake Park will be observed by presenting a Chautauqua Program of unusual strength and brilliancy. More money than ever has been appropriated for the building of a truly great Program. Every horizon is being scanned by the alert Superintendent for "stars of the first magnitude." Only those things which are really worth while will be presented.

The extraordinary achievements of the past has given to the Mountain Chautauqua a first place among the great Assemblies of America. It is always mentioned in connection with the "Mother" Chautauqua and Winona Lake, both of which have almost unlimited financial resources for their upbuilding.

The Programs of the Mountain Chautauqua have been prepared with rare skill and have included in the past years the best of everything in every line. Hardly a man of great prominence and power in American life can be named, who lectures at all, but has been heard at Mountain Lake Park. No more interesting and satisfactory Programs are anywhere presented.

And when one comes to talk of scenery, climate, health and all for which people seek in any ideal Summer outing, the home of this Chautauqua is absolutely without a rival in America.

This silver Jubilee year Program is now rapidly being prepared. It is yet too early to give all the details, but enough can be definitely told to give assurance of an unusually attractive Program. A notable feature of this anniversary year will be the return of many of the most popular speakers of other years.

Leon H. Vincent and Dr. W. A. Colledge will present a series of biographical studies.

Jahu DeWitt Miller will lecture, this being his nineteenth season at Mountain Lake Park.

Sunshine Hawks and Hon. Lou J. Beauchamp, successes of the past, will return.

Other prominent speakers will be Dr. John Watson (Ian McLaren), who will preach and lecture. United States Senator Elmer J. Burkett, Congressman D. J. Foster of Vermont, and likely Senator Benj. Tillman, for a great excursion day, will be among the prominent politicians present.

If arrangements can be made Commander Peary will tell of his search for the North Pole.

Rev. George Wood Anderson and A. Wirt Lowther will also lecture. A joint debate on Government Ownership and Trusts between W. M. Mills and J. B. Barnhill will be one of the events of the program.

Edward P. Elliott, the impersonator of plays, and William Sterling Battis, the impersonator of Dickens' characters, will appear.

Miss Cora Mel Patten will give a week of readings, and Carroll Brent Chilton will present a series of lecture-recitals on the master musicians with musical interpretations.

The music will include the popular Stevens' Band. The Weber Male Quartette, with Miss Grace Sanborn, reader, with other quartettes and soloists, still to be announced. Dr. Johann Blose, a musician of marked ability, will direct the chorus and have charge of the School of Music.

The Seton Indians will have another happy time with Miss Nina Lamkin.

In pleasing novelties may be mentioned Nicola the Magician; Youna the Japanese Juggler, and many nights of the famous American Vitagraph with its wonderful Moving Pictures.

HOYES.

Mr. Colonel DeWitt is able to be out among his friends again after suffering for some time past with rheumatism.

Mr. William Callis conducted the services at Blooming Rose, also Mr. F. D. Dewitt at Friendsville last Sunday evening in the absence of the pastor at those two places.

Miss Gertrude Richter, of Accident, spent Saturday and Sunday with her friends Misses Olia and Bernadette Mattingly.

The stork was very cordially welcomed at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Bishoff Friday afternoon, Feb. 22nd, when it arrived with a little son for them.

Mr. H. R. DeWitt, of Oakland, is visiting his parents, Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Dewitt, at this writing.

Mr. Charles Callis was very pleasantly entertained by his best girl Sunday evening.

Mr. Joseph Keller has been quite ill for some time with grip and is only slightly improved at this writing.

Mrs. James Lowdermilk was suddenly taken ill Tuesday evening but is better at this writing.

Skating seems to be the chief amusement for the young people of Hoyes, and each time report the best time.

Miss Florence Edwards has almost fully recovered from a severe attack of qninsy.

Quite a number of persons from this place attended literary society at Accident last Friday night.

Resolutions Adopted By St. Paul's Sunday Sunday School.

Just before the close of the exercises in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Sunday school on last Sabbath the following resolutions were read and unanimously adopted:

WHEREAS, By the decree of our All-wise and Divine Heavenly Father, Catharine Townshend-Crane, once a pupil, and then a teacher in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Sunday school of Oakland, has been called to the reward of the finally faithful; and

WHEREAS, From her earliest childhood she was a member of this Sunday school and through the ministrations of the Gospel of this church in the year 1872 was converted, and entered upon the enjoyment of a christian life and continued in the faith, showing by her walk and conversation from that time forward that she was a child of God, shedding upon those about her the same influences of the Spirit which so fully dominated and controlled her life, and when in the year 1891, after the completion of this present church edifice, took charge of the infant department of this Sunday school where for twelve consecutive years she moulded and shaped the christian training of the little ones, many of whom are now standing in the front ranks of the church and by her teaching and example was instrumental in leading many of them to the foot of the Cross, and continued during all the years of her residence in Oakland to lend a helping hand to advance the Sunday school and the cause of Christ; therefore be it

Resolved, By St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Sunday school of Oakland, That in the death of Mrs. Catharine Townshend-Crane we recognize the visitation of Providence, to which we bow with a submissive spirit, knowing that our loss is her eternal gain, and that she has joined that Sunday school above, where a countless multitude surrounds the Throne, singing praises to the Lamb; and be it further

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Sunday school that her work among us was of inestimable value and its effect far reaching, beyond our power to discern, but rightly valued and credited to her in Heaven; and be it further

Resolved, That we commend her family to the care and love of God, who doeth all things well, and who will help them to bear their grief in this present time, looking to the reunion beyond the tomb; that a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to her family; spread upon the minutes of the school and furnished the county papers for publication.

Letter to E. Z. Tower.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: We asked City Drug Co., Crystal Springs, Miss., to sell Devoe. They wanted to know, of their own knowledge, how it compared with another paint they knew all about—it was sold right there, and considered good.

They painted the house of W. B. McCluney two coats on purpose to test the two paints against one-another: one coat Devoe 6 gallons; the other coat that other paint 10 gallons. Difference $20; $7 for paint, $13 for labor.

That other paint is made in New Orleans; is pure; is considered an excellent paint, and has a good deal of local goodwill.

But the standard of paint has been low all through the southwest. That paint is thin; it is, you see, six-tenths of a paint. Devoe saves $20 over it on half a small job.

It is a case of local best compared with actual best.

Yours truly,

15 F. W. DEVOE & CO.

Dixon & Kelso, Oakland and C. M. Rathbun & Sons, Mountain Lake Park, sell our paint.

A Card of Thanks.

We desire in this way to express our thanks for, and appreciation of, the large and splendid donation so kindly made to us on last Saturday evening, by our friends, both in and out of the church. We appreciate very much the many good things, including almost everything in the line of edibles also a goodly purse of money; but we appreciate even more the spirit which prompted the act and which we take as an expression of the esteem and good will of the people among and for whom the Master has sent us to labor.

With hearty thanks to all and a prayer for God's blessing upon each one we are

REV. and MRS. J. B. WORKMAN and FAMILY.

Rushing Work on Gas Line.

A big crew of men are working on the gas line between here and Moore. This is the extra line they are laying between this place and the gas field to supply the line running from here to Cumberland, which they have been working on all winter and have had some very rough territory to go through. We understand that they are getting pretty well toward Keyser with the Cumberland end, and there is not so much more to do between here and the gas field with the extra line, so it will not be long until Cumberland and vicinity will have gas.—Parsons Advocate.

Thrown Off Precipice.

T. J. Picking, of Terra Alta, was severely injured by being thrown over a precipice by a frightened horse near Rowlesburg last Wednesday. He and Charles Thomas were riding in a sleigh when the horse sprang over the ledge, throwing them about 30 feet. Mr. Picking's right leg was crushed, but he managed to drag Mr. Thomas from under the horse, and then to work himself painfully up the cliff nearly to the road, taking half an hour before they were found by C. W. Carrico.

Granted a Divorce.

In the United States Court for the District of Columbia on Monday Justice Gould signed a decree granting Martha M. Proctor an absolute divorce from Montague Proctor and allowing her to resume her maiden name, Martha M. Conners. These parties were married in Deer Park on July 19th, 1895.

Murdered at the Opera House the prices on the best photographs your money can buy from one cent each up, all guaranteed. Pryor.

Has Disposed of His Store.

Mr. Herman Creutzburg, proprietor of the Oakland Meat Market, disposed of his stock of goods and the fixtures in the store room on last Saturday to Mr. W. D. Dixon, who assumed charge the same day. The store is being managed by Mr. Sam Compton who looks after the business satisfactorily to customers and proprietor.

BLOOMINGTON.

Mr. Charles Wolf, a miner, aged about 50 years, is dead at his home on Luke Hill. Mr. Wolf was employed by the Davis Coal and Coke Co., and was seriously injured on last Tuesday afternoon in the Buxton mine, by a fall of coal and slate. His left leg was broken above the ankle, and two ribs fractured, puncturing the right lung. He died on Thursday afternoon, two days after the accident. He leaves a wife and 9 children, of whom are married. The funeral services were held in the Bloomington to M. E. Church, Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. Interment in the grave yard at this place.

The Marstellar Coal Company, of Hampshire, comtemplate extensive improvements to the plant in the spring. The output of the mine will be doubled and many new dwellings erected to accommodate the increased employes.

A fire at an early hour on last Friday morning destroyed a dwelling house with all its contents at the thriving little town of Bond. The occupant had placed his furniture in the house preparatory to moving his family. The fire caught from an overheated stove pipe and when first discovered was burning fiercely.

Mr. Charles Morehead, who was injured in the Buxton mine about three weeks ago and sent to the Keyser hospital for treatment, will return home on Saturday.

Miss Edith Brady, daughter of Mr. John Brady, of Cedar Cliff, has been the guest of relatives in this place during the week.

AN UNSEEN DANGER IN FOOD

TO GUARD SHIPS against the unseen dangers at sea, the United States Government maintains lighthouses.

To guard your home against the unseen dangers of food products, the Government has enacted a pure food law. The law compels the manufacturers of baking powder to print the ingredients on the label of each can.

The Government has made the label your protection—so that you can avoid alum—read it carefully, if it does not say pure cream of tartar hand it back and

Say plainly—

ROYAL BAKING POWDER

ROYAL is a pure, cream of tartar baking powder—a pure product of grapes—aids the digestion—adds to the healthfulness of food.

Mr. James Stark, of near Bittinger, was in Oakland last Monday for a few hours on a business mission.

Dr. Gilbert Selby, of Eglon, was in Oakland Tuesday afternoon as the guest of his brother Dr. Benj. F. Selby.

FOR SALE—Several heating stoves in good repair. Apply to Joseph E. Harned, Oakland Pharmacy.

Merchant Charles H. Brown, who visited his old home over at Uniontown, Pa., for a week, returned to Oakland last Wednesday night.

Just received at Gonder's, new Ravenscroft building, four hundred Gold Mould Edison records, 25 cents each. Come early and secure your choice.

Mrs. Herman Creutzberg, who visited friends and relatives in Cumberland and Lonaconing for several weeks, returned to Oakland Monday afternnon.

Mr. Otho J. Paugh, one of our patrons, hailing from near Barnum, made this office an early morning visit Monday.

Dr. H. Scott, remembered by many in Oakland as the pastor of St. Paul's M. E. church until a few years ago, is spending the winter in Florida with his wife and daughter.

Messrs. Alan C. Dodson, of Bethlehem, Pa., and George W. McFarlane, superintendent of mines at Barnum and Dodson, this county, were in Oakland Monday for a few hours looking after some business interests of the coal companies in which they are interested.

The venerable Samuel Ferguson, one of Oakland's oldest and highest respected citizens, has been quite ill for a week or more with an attack of grip and its kindred ailments. His many friends hope for his speedy restoration to health.

Mr. Daniel O. Kimmell, of Shinnston, West Va., where he is employed by the Hope Oil Company as an inspector of wells, spent several days recently in Oakland and the community nearabout. He is a son of Mr. Chauncey Kimmell and went to the Ohio and West Virginia oil fields several years ago.

Mrs. L. L Loar and daughter, Miss Ethel, will leave this evening for Pinehurst, North Carolina, where they will remain a season for the benefit of Miss Ethel's health. The young lady has been in poor health for some time past, her condition necessitating her leaving school at the Buckhannon Seminary early in the winter. It is the hope of all that the trip to North Carolina may greatly benefit her.—Grafton Sentinel.

Clerk John C. Dunham of the City Council, gives notice in this paper today of the municipal election to be held on Monday, March 11th, for the pnrpose of electing three members of the Town Council.

In another column of THE REPUBLICAN today Mr. John W. Williams, of Philadelphia, advertises for sale or rent his property located near Deer Park. The advertisement contains a full description of the buildings and grounds surrounding them.

Mr. Austin Brown, who is interested in the casket and coffin works recently established at Clarksburg, W. Va., will start on the road as the travelling representative of his firm some time early in March. The factory has already made quite a number of shipments of the finished product and a large business is expected to be built up.

A community torn by dissensions, rent asunder by strife and contention—the people ready always to fly at each other's throats on account of rivalry and petty jealousies—can never hope to succeed. The universal brotherhood of man is constantly deferred and the end of time will appear before this great desideratum can be brought about, unless man shall be brought to the realization of this, his dominant, weakness. Let him inquire, "Who is my neighbor?"

Mr. Jesse J. Ashby, Jr., of near Crellin, was in Oakland yesterday afternoon on business when he called to see THE REPUBLICAN. For a year or more Mr. Ashby has had a number of men engaged in developing the coal underlying his farm adjacent to Crellin, recently completing an air shaft of nearly sixty feet deep to afford ventilation to the mine. The heading has been driven about seven hundred feet into the hill and an excellent quality of coal is being mined which finds a ready sale.

Young man, do not take up the study of medicine unless you are morally certain that you are fitted for carving out for yourself a brilliant future in that profession. About 12,500 medical graduates are being turned out by the colleges each year, while there is need of only about 2,500 according to one of our most distinguished practitioners. Better stay at home on the farm, where brain, brawn and energy will always win its own reward. The well-to do farmer of today is the most independent man on the green footstool.

FOR SALE—Pair young bay horses; weight 2600 pounds; good workers and sound. Apply to C. A. Ashby, Crellin, Md. 4t-paid.

Mrs. R. B. Ward received a message on Tuesday morning conveying the sad intelligence of the sudden death of her mother, Mrs. Metcalf, who died the evening previous at the home of Dr. Ward's brother in Chillicothe, Ohio, where the deceased lady was visiting at the time. Mrs. Ward left Oakland Tuesday evening for Bellaire, Ohio, Mrs. Metcalf's home, to which point the remains were conveyed and where the funeral will take place today. Dr. Ward went to Bellaire yesterday morning. Mrs. Metcalf was well known in Oakland, having made her home here with her daughter several years ago.

The man who makes money in a community has a duty to perform to that community. It may be that he has made his money by his superior business ability, and that he would have done as well anywhere. That does not alter the case. If his gifts are great his responsibility is equally as great. No man was placed on earth for the sole purpose of making money, and the man who has this as his ideal had better never have been born. It is not an act of charity, but the performance of a simple duty for the man who has made money to pass a little of it on for the benefit of the community, even though he never expects to see a dollar of his contribution back.

In every city there are movements which call for the expenditure of money. Some of these are of a distinctly public character, and are paid for through taxation. Others are of a semi-public character, and for them the funds must be raised by voluntary contributions. These must come from the men who are doing the business of the place and who have the money. There is no other way. The man who has the money is the man who must pay the bills, if they are to be paid. Most enterprises of a public nature which have for their object the bettering of conditions, business and otherwise, in a city will, directly or indirectly, return more than the money expended to those who pay it.

THE MOUNTAIN CHAUTAUQUA.

Some of the Events Scheduled for the Assembly in August.

The session of 1907 covers from August 2nd to August 28th. The Silver Jubilee of Mountain Lake Park will be observed by presenting a Chautauqua Program of unusual strength and brilliancy. More money than ever has been appropriated for the building of a truly great Program. Every horizon is being scanned by the alert Superintendent for "stars of the first magnitude." Only those things which are really worth while will be presented.

The extraordinary achievements of the past has given to the Mountain Chautauqua a first place among the great Assemblies of America. It is always mentioned in connection with the "Mother" Chautauqua and Winona Lake, both of which have almost unlimited financial resources for their upbuilding.

The Programs of the Mountain Chautauqua have been prepared with rare skill and have included in the past years the best of everything in every line. Bunny Travers was not a bad fellow. On the contrary, everybody liked him, and everybody said it was too bad that he had money and had spent six months in London to learn the ways of an ass. One day when the subject of the up to date girl was on the carpet Bunny listened for awhile with a bored air and then observed:

"It's all theory. She cawn't be found, ye knaw. They are the same old languishing lot, just a lot of gurls, with their giggle and twaddle and waiting for a proposal. As I may have remarked before, they bore me—bore me dweadfully. Weally, I think I shall have to cut the whole lot of them."

Among those who regarded Bunny as an asinine good fellow was Burt Galbraith, the young partner in a downtown brokerage firm. He had a wife and a home on the north shore of Long Island, and his sister Nettie lived with them. As he listened to Bunny's observations a smile hovered around his mouth, and that night when he got home he said to the sister:

"Say, Net, we've got a feller in the Clipper club that needs bumping, and he needs it bad. I am going to invite him down to stay for a week."

"What for?" was asked.

"So that you can bump him. He doesn't believe there's an up to date girl in America."

Bunny balked a little when invited down to the island home. He was at last prevailed upon, however, and one Monday afternoon he was safely landed at Ravensrest. Half an hour later Miss Nettie was dressed for a spin in her brother's auto and informed the visitor that a twenty mile ride was on the cards. If it would bore him, why"—

"Not in the least, me deah gurl. I rawther fawncy the thing, doncher knaw, or think I should if there was any speed in it. If you can assure me of twenty miles an hour I shall be positively chawmed."

He was quietly assured, and after the machine got well started he found the assurance well founded. Bunny began to get nervous after the speed exceeded fifteen miles an hour, but he managed to restrain himself until it had reached twenty-five. Then his hat blew off, his hair stood up, and there was a quiver to his voice as he turned to the girl and said:

"Oh, now, I thought we came out to see the landscape, doncher knaw."

Farmers began to yell, dogs to bark and drivers of teams to draw out to the fences as the speed was raised to thirty miles an hour, and Bunny Travers confessed to himself that for the first time in two years he wasn't bored. The pace went to thirty-five and then to forty, and he finally judged that it had gone to a hundred and the auto was flying above the trees. Then it slackened as they entered a village, and the girl steered the machine up one street and down another and finally halted before the office of a justice of the peace. A benign looking old gentleman came out, and the girl handed him $5.

"Now, then, what's all this?" asked Bunny as Miss Nettie was turning the machine about.

"Oh, whenever I exceed the speed limit I stop and pay a fine. They don't have to arrest me and have witnesses and a trial. Saves time and carries out the letter of the law, you know. Little invention of my own, and I am thinking of taking out a patent. I'll try for a mile a minute going back."

Bunny groaned. To his utter amazement, he was not in the least bored. On the contrary, he was anxious to suggest that Miss Nettie accept a check for $1,000 for the benefit of charity and allow him to walk home. Before he could state the case, however, the machine was under way. When they reached home the girl found a bundle of clothes in the seat beside her. After awhile Bunny Travers emerged from the bundle and said that he was a changed man.

An hour after breakfast next morning when Bunny had finished his cigar his entertainer asked him if he wouldn't like to have a bout with the foils. He smiled incredulously, but she asked him to follow her to the billiard room and there produced a pair of foils. Here was his opportunity to get even with her for the scare of the day before. He would disarm her three or four times and wound her vanity. It was Bunny, however, who was pinked and disarmed and driven all around the room and made to look like 30 cents. The afternoon was rainy, and Miss Nettie proposed billiards and pool. Bunny began by giving her twenty on billiards and four balls on pool and in the course of three hours found that she could give him all that and then win every game.

Next morning he got up to wonder what was coming. He soon found out. There was a cracking good sailing breeze, and the whitecaps were running on the sound. When Miss Nettie proposed a sail in her catboat, Bunny looked at those whitecaps for a long minute, and shivers ran up his back. He followed her down to the boat landing, however, and did his best to appear indifferent. The girl hoisted the sail, took a reef in it and then shipped the tiller, and the visitor was asked to sit amidships and trim the craft. When half a mile out and just after the fifth barrel of spray had struck him in the back, he said something about having an important engagement in the city, but the boat did not cease to bounce nor the spray to fly for nearly an hour later. Miss Nettie was also sopping wet and her hair flying, but she was bumping Bunny. On approaching the landing she rounded into the wind, held fast to the sheet and yelled out as the boat turned turtle. She was alongside of him as he came up, sputtering and gasping, and as she reached out a hand and drew him to the overturned boat she said:

"Hang on here, and we shall be blown ashore. We might as well have a bath while we are about it. Hope you are enjoying yourself."

When Bunny went to his room for the night he was almost ready to admit that he was wrong in arguing that there were no up to date girls. The next morning something happened to please him. He was invited to take a morning gallop in company with the young lady, and he saw his way clear to pay off old scores. He was given the best mount, but the gallop had not covered a hundred rods when it was evident that horse and man were not agreed. At the first fence to be jumped the horse remained on one side and Bunny on the other, while the girl disappeared in the distance and didn't seem to miss her cavalier for a full hour. Bunny's excuse was that he lifted his horse too soon for the jump and that there was something wrong with the climate of the United States.

Next day the visitor and Miss Nettie went buggy riding. Bunny took the reins with a determination to show off. He was showing when Miss Nettie took the reins away and brought the runaway animal down to his paces. There was one more bump in store for the young man. Next day, after wrestling for an hour with his palpitating heart, he made a proposal in due form. Miss Nettie realized what was coming and was prepared for it. She simply handed him an advertisement she had written and proposed to insert in the leading papers. It read:

"An up to date girl wishes to adopt an orphan boy and be a mother to him. Will teach him how to climb trees, stand on his head and turn back handsprings. All new ideas taught as soon as they appear. A positive guarantee given not to bore him. A cure for languidness and the London complaint kept constantly on hand. Address in confidence."

That was another bump for Bunny, but he took it like a little man. Instead of returning to his old ways and his old life, he went over to Oldfields and bought the right to plant oysters, and he has displayed such energy and ambition during the past year that Burt Galbraith looks at him across the club dinner table and mutters to himself:

"I wonder why in thunder Net does not name the day. I know they love each other and are as good as engaged."

A Progressive Age.

Pierre de Campe, who was calcimining the Bradly kitchen, was so excessively slow that his discouraged employers began to fear that the deliberate Frenchman meant to end his days under their roof.

"Do you think," asked Mrs. Bradly desperately, "that you'll be done by 5 o'clock, so we can cook dinner?"

"Madame," replied Pierre, pausing to gesticulate with his brush, "maybe you have hear som' peop' say dat dis ees de age of progress. Oui, madame, eet ees de age of too moch progress. Evairew'ere hon dose states of America dere ees too moch 'urry, 'urry, 'urry. Evairew'ere eet ees 'Make 'aste, make 'aste!' Dere ees no ripose—no taime for do notting good. Evairew'ere I am come wit' ma pail, ma brush, ma scaffold, eet ees not 'Pierre, how good you can do dose vork?' but 'Pierre, how queek you ees got t'rough?' Parbleu! Biffore a man ees get one leg een hees hovairhall som'bod' ees hask heem, 'Say, meester, how soon you go vay?'"—Youth's Companion.

Books That Helped.

"What books have helped you most?" asked the sincere and serious young woman.

"I can't recall all of 'em," answered Mr. Cumrox, "but they were mostly stories with love and fighting in them. You see, I was in the book selling business when I began to get prosperous."—Washington Star.

Explosive.

The Count—Have you asked for ze rich young lady's hand yet?

The Duke—Yes, and I think lightning must have struck the telephone.

The Count—Ah! Maybe the wires are crossed!

The Duke—No. I think it is her father who is crossed.—Chicago News.

The Perkins Family Have Their Troubles

Why the Head of the Family Did Not Exchange an Old Piano For a New One.

[Copyright, 1905, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.]

MR. AND MRS. PERKINS had got seated for the evening and were seemingly content and happy when she looked up from her book and queried:

"Mr. Perkins, would it put you out very much if I were to ask you a question?"

"Why, dear, you may ask me ten thousand."

"And you won't be vexed?"

"Nothing you could say would vex me. Proceed."

"Well, one day last May, when we were sitting on the front steps, I spoke to you about the piano. Do you remember?"

"I do, my dear, and I have the evidence right here in my pocket. My memorandum book says it was on the 18th day at 3 o'clock in the afternoon. It was a beautiful day. What you said to me about the piano was:

"'It is forty years old.

"'It is old fashioned.

"'It has straight legs.

"'There are seven broken keys.

"'The pedals are out of order.

"'It wheezes like an old horse.

"'Everybody makes fun of it.

"'Can't you turn it in toward a new one?'

"Those were your observations, Mrs. Perkins. Have you anything to add to them tonight?"

"Did you put down what you said in reply?"

"I did, and here it is:

"'Yes, it is an old piano.

"'I have been ashamed of it for years.

"'During the next three months I shall turn it in toward a new one.

"'It must drive the neighbors distracted to hear you try to play on it.

"'Say no more, darling. You shall have a new piano before the 1st of September.'

"Those were our respective remarks and observations, Mrs. Perkins, as accurately recorded here, and have you anything to add to them at this moment?"

"SHE WAS POUNDING."

"Well, I wanted to call your attention to the fact that September had come and gone."

"I acknowledge it."

"And the old piano stands there yet in the parlor."

"Acknowledged again."

"And, so far as I know, no steps have been taken to replace it with a new one."

"Not a step, Mrs. Perkins, and I am now prepared to reason the case with you. I have been expecting to reason it with you for the last month—in fact, I was hoping you would speak to me about it this very evening."

"Well, I have spoken."

"You see, my dear," began Mr. Perkins, as he drew a long breath, "we must begin at the beginning. Neither of us is a musician. We have neither son nor daughter to play. We might just as well have a corn sheller in the parlor for all the use we could make of it. If we had a thousand dollar piano, what good would it do us?"

"Why, I play, and you know I do and have praised me," replied Mrs. Perkins in an injured tone.

"My dear woman, let us look facts in the face. You drum on the piano. You howl an accompaniment. You roll your eyes. You hump your shoulders. At various times I have said that you played beautifully. I did it to keep you playing and have revenge on the neighbors."

"How dare you talk to me that way?"

"Come, now, be reasonable. You never took a music lesson in your life, did you?"

"No, but what of that?"

"You can't sing any more than a crow."

"But if I can't"—

"I don't revert to these things to humiliate you, Mrs. Perkins, but simply to clear the ground for a start. It is a husband's business to praise his wife's playing even if it gives him toothache. The cold fact is that neither of us can play or sing. Therefore, of what use is a thousand dollar piano? You will answer that one would look nice in the parlor. I agree with you, but when you have a $1,000 piano you must have a $500 rug to go with it; also a new parlor suit."

"But there are several neighbors who can play and sing," protested Mrs. Perkins.

"I haven't the slightest doubt of it, Mrs. Perkins. There are several neighbors who can wear your hats and shoes, but are you going to keep hats and shoes for the neighbors? Suppose, however, that we went ahead and got a new piano. Do you know that piano playing makes women round shouldered and weak chested and consumptive?"

"I never heard that it did and don't believe it."

"I could give you medical statistics by the cartload. Within the last ten years paralysis of the arms has become so common that the doctors attribute it to piano playing. There are hundreds of instances where young ladies have lost the use of both arms for a year. If we had a piano I couldn't run the risk of your losing the use of your arms. How, then, could you longer hug me? How prepare the meals and make the bed?"

"You are simply trying to twist out of it, just as you always do," said Mrs. Perkins, with her eyes full of tears.

"My dear, I am no twister. I am simply a logician and a philosopher. I reason things to a conclusion. We cannot afford a $1,000 piano, and on top of it a $500 rug, a $250 parlor suit and five or six paintings costing $100 apiece. All that capital would be shut up in a cold parlor for the winter. If put into ice for next season it might be doubled. And there's another thing."

"Oh, you can be finding excuses for a week to come."

"This is no excuse, but a fact. That old straight legged, broken keyed piano belonged to my first wife. Don't jump up and grow red in the face, for I'm not hitting at you. The first time I called to see her, when we were both young people, she was playing on that piano. She was pounding. She was howling. Her eyes were rolling heavenward. I fell in love with her at once."

"I won't stay!" declared Mrs. Perkins as she stamped her foot on the floor.

"Just a moment, my dear. She continued to pound and howl all through our engagement. She brought the old piano along when we were married. Every day and every evening it was pound and howl. I talked to her of the risks she ran, but she was self willed. She finally began to fade. The doctor said she lasted a year longer than he expected, but she went with a rush when she did go. She had been pounding and howling one evening and the neighbors had telephoned for the police and all the dogs for a mile around were barking, when I observed a sudden change come over her, and she fell off the piano stool and was dead in a moment. She never opened her eyes or spoke. There's my case, Mrs. Perkins, and"—

"I say you are a dodger and a twister!" exclaimed Mrs. Perkins as she gave a sniff of contempt and walked stiffly out of the room.

Mr. Perkins stooped to scratch his ankle and then straightened up to scratch his nose and then smiled and said to himself:

"But, then, don't a married man have to be?" M. QUAD.

Modern Terseness.

Recently a city editor in Ottumwa, Ia., was informed by phone at a late hour that a prominent citizen had died suddenly. Calling one of the reportorial staff, the city editor instructed him hurriedly, and the young man shot out of the office on double quick. Some twenty minutes later he returned, and as he hastened to the corner where his typewriter stood the city editor asked him:

"Well, what about it?"

"Oh, nothing," said the young man as he began making the keys rattle, "only as Mr. Blank was walking along the street he says, 'I'm going to die,' and he leaned up against the fence and made good."—Judge.

Facts In the Case.

Lawyer (examining witness)—Do you know the man who formerly owned this gun?

Witness—Yes, sir.

Lawyer—Is he in the courtroom?

Witness—No, sir.

Lawyer—Where is he?

Witness—I don't know.

Lawyer—When and where did you see him last?

Witness—Six months ago—at his funeral.—Detroit Tribune.

So There!

The world is better nowadays
Than fifty years ago,
I know, and there are many ways
That give me cause to know.

The "Unearned Increment" In America.

By LESLIE M. SHAW, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States.

THE first piece of land I ever owned any interest in was 160 acres south of my town. My law partner and I got $480 together and bought a quarter section at $3 an acre. We broke it out, plowed it and rented it and were able to get interest on the cost and the cost of improvements. Then we sold it. That land was just as productive then as it is now, and we were glad to get interest on $3 an acre, plus the cost of improvements, but the rascal who owns it now has watered the stock until he wants to get interest on $75 an acre! There's over $70 an acre watered—UNEARNED INCREMENT.

Of the matchless wealth of this country, over a hundred billions, 75 per cent of it is UNEARNED. We buy forests and no one expects a man to sell the lumber at what it cost him. Oh, then, you can have three or four fold on what you pay for it? Of this wonderful development there is much unearned.

If any one asked me the distinctive characteristic of the American citizen, I should say it is JUDICIAL MINDEDNESS. I am going to cast that into the solution of these great problems that will be ours to solve, but somehow the American people are going to do justly, and we are going to say that we will divide this three-quarters of what we are worth SO THAT EACH FELLOW SHALL HAVE A LITTLE MORE THAN HE EARNS—a little share of the unearned increment. I do not know how much. I cannot sit down and figure it out with a pencil, but we will say to the man who owns the forests, You can have somewhat more than a return on your money, but we will say to no one, You can control and do just as you please. We will not say to the railroad, You can charge whatever you please SIMPLY BECAUSE THE RAILROAD IS THERE.

We have settled the question within five or six years that no one of Uncle Sam's children ever gets so big that he may not be taken out on the front porch and punished as small boys are sometimes punished. But we don't want to take the big boys out on the front porch and punish them FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE NEIGHBORS. Corporal punishment in the family is an excellent thing, provided the recipient knows for what the punishment is administered and that it is done with justice and with certainty and then forgotten. But you let it be understood that every time John comes in he is to be licked JUST BECAUSE HE IS JOHN, then you have destroyed the good of it. We must be conservative and careful, as well as jealous of our rights.

We have developed until we have the best railroad system in the world. The roads need more tracks. One of the greatest railroad men of the time told me we needed 70,000 miles more track, without counting terminals, to carry the freight.

We are proud of our export trade. We grow three-quarters of the cotton of the world, and the world has NO OTHER PLACE TO GO FOR RAW MATERIAL except the United States.

IT DOES NOT TAKE AN INTERNATIONAL MERCHANT TO SELL RAW COTTON TO THE WORLD THAT MUST HAVE IT AND HAS NO OTHER PLACE TO GO FOR IT. THE WORLD HAS NEVER SIX MONTHS' FOOD IN ADVANCE OF WHAT IT WANTS.

Small Fleets, Big Ships, The Present Tendency.

By EDWIN S. CRAMP, Builder of Many War Vessels.

THERE is little doubt that within a short time the American navy will have smaller fleets of LARGER VESSELS, instead of large squadrons of small vessels. England has set the example, and the other countries are following. The policy is a good one. Five large battleships making up a squadron, each with eight large guns, will prove MUCH MORE EFFECTIVE than ten ships with four guns each. Not only will the fleets take up smaller space, but they will be more easily maneuvered, which, of course, will be a great advantage.

There is every prospect that within a comparatively few years the United States will have in its navy some of the BIGGEST VESSELS AFLOAT. The Dreadnought has demonstrated that monster battleships are successful, but it will not be very long before there will be larger ones. The Dreadnought is of 18,000 tons. I believe that ships of 25,000 tons will be built and that they will prove great engines of war. We have facilities at our shipyards for building ships of that size, because we anticipated the conditions of the future which will demand larger battleships.

PEOPLE HAVE BEEN SAYING FOR THE LAST TWENTY-FIVE YEARS THAT THE LIMIT HAS BEEN REACHED, BUT IT IS NOT YET IN SIGHT. WHAT THIS COUNTRY CAN DO IS LARGELY DEPENDENT UPON WHAT OTHER COUNTRIES CAN DO AND WILL DO.

"Railway Combinations Benefit the Public."

By J. C. STUBBS, Traffic Director Union Pacific—Southern Pacific System.

WHEN a new railroad is built its traffic manager thinks he MUST ring the bell, wave the flag and open up with a cut in rates, and, sooner or later, the other carriers must respond OR GO OUT OF BUSINESS, and a rate war may result. But in time the traffic manager of the new line learns, as those of the older lines already have learned, that rate cutting is neither for the benefit of the railway NOR FOR THE PUBLIC. He learns other roads can speedily meet any cuts he may make and that the only result of reductions of rates is loss of revenue.

RAILWAY COMBINATIONS HAVE TENDED TO GIVE STABILITY TO RATES AND HAVE THEREBY CONFERRED AS MUCH BENEFIT ON THE PUBLIC AS ON RAILWAY STOCKHOLDERS.

Rates as a whole in the United States are low, as compared with foreign countries, and UNDER PRESENT CONDITIONS reductions are made just as rapidly as commercial and industrial conditions warrant them.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

The following articles have been received for publication in the series.

OUTSIDE CO-OPERATION.

When considering the needs of our schools it is to me very evident that the interest and personal supervision of the trustees would be one of the greatest and most immediate helps.

The trustees who visit their school, show an interest in the condition of the buildings, qualifications of the teacher, improvement of the pupils, and in the supplies and expenses, are, I regret to say, few and far between. Mr. Harned of Oakland has been cited as a model trustee and Mr. Wolf of Red House as his equal. One who taught at the latter place some years ago saying of the trustee named, as follows: "He was sufficiently interested to lose money in order to visit his school. The teacher was upheld in the right, encouraged in depression, advised in difficulty, while the pupils did better work and became more interested." To Mr. Wolf, the teacher gave the credit for the success of the year.

Too often the buildings are neglected and the "nail in time" left out works as great damage as the proverbial stitch. Too often these men keep the ease (ees) and forget the trust. Too often the entire term has elapsed before one thinks of visiting the school.

In one case, the reply to inquiries concerning no visits from trustees being, "When things go wrong, I'll be on hand." Why not come around and help us to keep things going right?

And a word to the parents: Why do you not come out to see and hear what is done and said to your little ones? Have you reasons or only excuses to give for your non-appearance? Are you of those who have not time to visit the school, but have hours to spend gossiping and telling and hearing tales unfit for the ears of upright men and women?

Residents of each school district are very anxious to secure a conscientious, pains-taking teacher for their school, but are not willing to encourage or assist in these ways. Pupils would advance, teachers would work more successfully and the schools of our county would reach a higher plane, were the patrons to prove their interest by their personal visits.

Come, then, to see us. Find out if the story of partiality told by Johnnie, is true. See for yourself that your children are in the care of teachers who are trying to lead them onward and upward.

HOW TO TEACH TO READ.

In teaching reading, there are just two ends to be sought: to make the pupil quick in the recognition of word and letter forms and values, to secure his interest in the content of the printed forms. Both these aims must be kept steadily in view by the primary teacher, for, although the pupil's ability to recognize promptly and accurately, printed and written words, is the main thing to secure at first, yet at the same time this recognition is greatly aided by the feeling of interest aroused by the content of the words.

Therefore, learning to read cannot be a purely mechanical process, even in the first lesson. From the very beginning, the words used to make a reading lesson must express thought of interest to them. In teaching primary reading, there are four methods in use: phonic, a-b-c, word and sentence method. The a-b-c method begins by teaching the child his "letters," and after he learns them so that he can name any of them at sight, he is drilled upon spelling combinations of them in words, such as cat, rat, bat, et cetera, and the next step after that is to read! This method is uninteresting, unnatural, and wasteful of time and energy. The phonic method is better, because it teaches the sound of the letters—their vocal values, and a well-drilled pupil will soon be able to pronounce readily written or printed words which he has seen before.

In the word method, the word is the unit of thought for the pupil, and is the largest whole which he ought to be expected to grasp at first.

The sentence method is nearly an ideal way of teaching beginners to read, provided it can be used under ideal conditions. These conditions are, that there shall be few pupils to a teacher; that she shall be free to do some object teaching and language work before reading is taken up at all; that the teacher have time and tact to draw from the pupils themselves the sentences which they are after to read; that the teacher shall be able to draw.

But in the ungraded schools, the teacher has neither time nor opportunity to devote to that time of teaching. So, in such schools perhaps the best results may be obtained by using a combination of all four methods.

VALUE OF PUBLIC SPIRIT.

How a Massachusetts Town Has Profited by It.

What an active public spirit and an energetic campaign for civic improvements can do is shown by what the Village improvement association of Framingham, Mass., has accomplished.

Then there was the experience with the hencoop on the common, says the Boston Herald. That is a charming piece of ground in Framingham Center, with the old town hall at one end, a high school at the side, two churches at the far end and well planned houses on the fourth side. For years there had been desecrating hencoops and a poultry yard in front of the high school.

The association attacked all that. It was a small matter—so small that nobody at first seemed to have interest enough to act. Then one morning the town set to work, tore down the coop, plowed up the hen yards and began improving the common. The school committee, which had been somewhat apathetic in its attitude, spoke glowingly in print soon afterward of the good that had been done by taking away the coops. The improvement association smiled and did not charge anybody with having stolen its thunder.

Then, again, there is the case of the old town hall, a center of activity when the business was in Framingham Center, as it is in South Framingham at present. The building was going to pieces. The improvement association set out to get it. It took time, but finally by an almost unanimous vote the association was given charge of the old white building at a nominal rental. It is going to be an expensive piece of business too. The members of the association have pledged $1,500 already for improving the exterior and the interior arrangements of the building, and there will be an ultimate expense of about $5,000. The return? Simply the belief that good has been done and the certainty that there will be a convenient place for dramatic and other entertainments, lectures; social gatherings, clubrooms, dining rooms, kitchen—in fact, as one member puts it, "a complete center for the improving and strengthening of the social and educational life of all."

Now that the association is custodian of the place it is a question merely of time when there will be pretty improvements on the common side of the hall, now not very artistic, and the common will be framed all around in excellent style.

Take even another instance of accomplishment. Soon after the association was formed lightning not only struck and damaged a Sir Christopher Wren spire of one of the most beautiful churches in Framingham, but defied precedent by striking it again. There were signs that the modernizing spot would "improve" the damaged spire. The editorial committee of the association became active at once, and today the spire is on the church in all its original grace.

There is a pretty hill in Framingham Center wooded with pine trees. Some time ago a rumor was spread around the town that there was a plan to buy the land and cut off all the trees. Near the knoll lives a member of the association, not a wealthy person as wealth goes even in Framingham. The place appealed to her on account of its natural beauty, and rather than see the trees cut down she bought the plot.

Near the house of this member is a little triangle where roads meet and cross. There was an old wooden signpost there. It was said that somebody proposed to buy up that little tract and put some building or other on it. The member bought that place. The old wooden sign went down, a substantial column with a pretty signboard went up, and climbing vines were planted by the member at the foot of the column. In midsummer or early autumn the sign is nothing if not an architectural cameo.

It was in recognition of the work done by the improvement association that the South Framingham board of trade appointed a special village improvement committee, and it was to aid the association that a town meeting, attended by 1,500, not only appointed a park commission, but made Dr. F. W. Patch, the president of the association, chairman.

"It was a perfectly safe appointment," comments one member, "for everybody knows that Dr. Patch has no ax to grind and that he would not know how to do the grinding if an ax were handed to him."

It is hard to put the finger on the cause or the causes of the remarkable success of the association in everything it tackles. For one thing, there is an activity which shows a boyish enthusiasm in going ahead and doing things. It isn't a sporadic alertness. It has come to stay.

FOR SALE OR
FOR RENT
For Summer 1907

At Deer Park, Maryland, Main Line B. & O. R. R., to St. Louis, 2,500 Feet Above Tidewate, a Country Place of About 180 Acres.

"GLAMORGAN."

Thoroughly equipped as a farm and bounded by three county roads, insuring convenience and privacy. It is well adapted to public use, such as a Sanatorium or to private residences, five sites with beautiful views and appurtenant acres, being reached by its three miles of private pleasure drives through the woods.

The dwelling house was built from plans by Hewitt Ross, of Philadelphia. The plumbing is by Ogelsby, of the same city. It is in complete order, and is replete with the modern appliances of a gentleman's residence. It is within ten minutes' walk of the post office and railroad station and within one mile of the Deer Park Hotel. Its general plan is as follows:

Wide porches surround three faces terminated, on a level, with billiard room.

I. FIRST FLOOR.—Parlor, hall with main staircase, library, dining room and lavatory.

II. BACK BUILDING.—Stair case to cellar, in which are furnace, gas machine (supplied by outside gasometer), wine closet, pantry (hot and cold water), back stairs to second story back building. Laundry—3 stationary tubs, hot and cold water in each; ironing stove, fire hose on reel and special boiler. Kitchen, with range, sink and all appliances. Back porch, ten feet from which is ice house practically inexhaustable in summer; servants' bath room, etc.

I. SECOND FLOOR.—Two communicating chambers, with bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; total, four chambers with three bath rooms.

II. BACK BUILDING, 2nd floor. Four chambers, two closets, bath room with W. C. adjoining.

THIRD FLOOR.—Two chambers, two large lofts.

Every room has gas fixtures and eight rooms have open fire-places in addition to furnace register.

The water supply is unexceptionable, its every source being from springs rising within the confines of the place and all having passed analytical examination. Two tanks (each in contact with outside air) having a combined capacity of 14,500 gallons, a wind mill, a horse power and an overshot wheel supplying the motor. Three dams (likewise spring water) contribute the ice supply and two of them are stocked with fish. The outbuildings are a barn with stalls for six horses and eight carriages, with ample storage for hay, straw and oats and having a coachman's room, a tenant's house of five rooms, a large cow and sheep stable and numerous sheds, etc.

This property is without encumbrance and possession can be given in May, 1907.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44-5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

A Trade Trick.

"I'm told that Pennem, the author, has gone into the real estate business," remarked Large.

"Yes," replied Little. "He's building half a dozen houses. Curious thing too. He's making a specialty of the basements."

"Probably he's going to advertise them as the six best cellars."—Woman's Home Companion.

Her Memory.

Gayley—You haven't had occasion to accuse me of playing poker for two years.

Mrs. Gayley—Three years, my dear.

Gayley—How do you know it's three years?

Mrs. Gayley—Because I've worn this dress that long, and I got it the last time I caught you.—Catholic Standard and Times.

In Harmony.

Gunner—I met that swell Miss Flasher and her swell French poodle on the Boulevard the other morning. She gave me a haughty bow.

Guyer—And what did the dog do?

Gunner—Why, he gave me a haughty "bowwow!"—Detroit Tribune.

She Trimmed Him.

"Have you heard how Hawks was trimmed?"

"No."

"The courts have ordered him to pay $25,000 for breach of promise to that pretty little manicure lady he used to tell us about."—Judge.

Anything to Be Obliging.

Old Lady—I guess this is the last pair of shoes you'll sell me, Mr. Johnson.

Shoeman—Oh, I hope you'll wear out a great deal of shoe leather yet.

Old Lady—No. I have one foot in the grave already.

Shoeman—Well, we would be glad to sell you shoes for the other foot, ma'am.—Sketch.

She Didn't Think.

Mrs. Gunbusta—What size rooms are there in this flat?

Real Estate Agent—About 3 by 4.

Mrs. Gunbusta — They wouldn't be quite large enough, because my husband has a 5 by 7 camera.—New York Press.

Clever Children.

Fond Father—Well, professor, how are my children getting on in their studies?

Professor—Finely. Arthur is a very clever boy, and Mary is too.—Lippincott's Magazine.

Atmosphere.

Mr. Ant—Bill Moth is going around telling people he feels like an actor.

Mr. Fly—Well, he ought to feel that way. He has been living in a heavy tragedian's fur overcoat six months.—Chicago News.

A New One.

The Old Bird—My eyes must be getting poor. I can't see the wires on which those birds are sitting.

The Young Bird—Your eyes are all right. That's a wireless telegraph.—New York Life.

A Desired Reform.

Mrs. Bloodblood—I told the grocer that unless he stopped drinking he'd lose all his business.

Mr. Bloodblood—That was a gent' hint for him to give up [illegible]—Judge.

Gas.

"Herr Huber, your wife has suffocated herself with gas."

Huber—Heavens! There'll be a nice gas bill to pay.—Fliegende Blatt.

A Contradiction.

"Money makes the mare go," said the man who quotes.

"Not always," answered young Mrs. Torkins; "not if it's Charley's money that is bet on the mare."—Washington Star.

There is a pretty hill in Framingham Center wooded with pine trees. Some time ago a rumor was spread around the town that there was a plan to buy the land and cut off all the trees. Near the knoll lives a member of the association, not a wealthy person as wealth goes even in Framingham. The place appealed to her on account of its natural beauty, and rather than see the trees cut down she bought the plot.

Near the house of this member is a little triangle where roads meet and cross. There was an old wooden signpost there. It was said that somebody proposed to buy up that little tract and put some building or other on it. The member bought that place. The old wooden sign went down, a substantial column with a pretty signboard went up, and climbing vines were planted by the member at the foot of the column. In midsummer or early autumn the sign is nothing if not an architectural cameo.

It was in recognition of the work done by the improvement association that the South Framingham board of trade appointed a special village improvement committee, and it was to aid the association that a town meeting, attended by 1,500, not only appointed a park commission, but made Dr. F. W. Patch, the president of the association, chairman.

"It was a perfectly safe appointment," comments one member, "for everybody knows that Dr. Patch has no ax to grind and that he would not know how to do the grinding if an ax were handed to him."

It is hard to put the finger on the cause or the causes of the remarkable success of the association in everything it tackles. For one thing, there is an activity which shows a boyish enthusiasm in going ahead and doing things. It isn't a sporadic alertness. It has come to stay.

For Summer 1907

At Deer Park, Maryland, Main Line B. & O. R. R., to St. Louis, 2,500 Feet Above Tidewate, a Country Place of About 180 Acres.

"GLAMORGAN."

Thoroughly equipped as a farm and bounded by first class county roads, insuring convenience and privacy. It is well adapted to public use, such as a Sanatorium or to private residences, five sites with beautiful views and appurtenant acres, being reached by its three miles of private pleasure drives through the woods.

The dwelling house was built from plans by Hewitt Bros., of Ph. ladelphia. The plumbing is by Ogelsby, of the same city. It is in complete order, and is replete with the modern appliances of a gentleman's residence. It is within ten minutes' walk of the post office and railroad station and within one mile of the Deer Park Hotel. Its general plan is as follows:

Wide porches surround three faces terminated, on a level, with billiard room.

I. FIRST FLOOR.—Parlor, hall with main stair case, library, dining room and lavatory.

II. BACK BUILDING.—Stair case to cellar, in which are urinals; gas machine supplied by outside gasometers, wine closet, pantry (hot and cold water), back stairs to second story back building. Laundry—3 stationary tubs, hot and cold water in each; ironing stove, fire hose on reel and special boiler. Kitchen, with range, sink and all appliances. Back porch, ten feet from which is ice house practically inexhaustable in summer; servants' bath room, etc.

I. SECOND FLOOR.—Two communicating chambers, with bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; total, four chambers with three bath rooms.

II. BACK BUILDING, SECOND FLOOR.—Four chambers, two closets, bath room with W. C. adjoining.

THIRD FLOOR.—Two chambers, two large lofts.

Every room has gas fixtures and eight rooms have open fire-places in addition to furnace register.

The water supply is unexceptionable, its every source being from springs rising within the confines of the place and all having passed analytical examination. Two tanks (each in contact with outside air) having a combined capacity of 14,500 gallons, a wind mill, a horse power and an overshot wheel supplying the motor. Three dams (likewise spring water) contribute the ice supply and two of them are stocked with fish. The outbuildings are a barn with stalls for six horses and eight carriages, with ample storage for hay, straw and oats and having a coachman's room, a tenant's house of five rooms, a large cow and sheep stable and numerous sheds, etc.

This property is without encumbrance and possession can be given in May, 1907.

To Our Trade and Friends.

On and after February 1st we have arranged to change our plan of doing business to a cash basis, opening accounts with only those who arrange for same by note payable at a specified time.

For years we have tried the credit business but find former methods are not adequate to the present. Goods now are sold on an entirely different plan. Cash buyers buy where they can buy the cheapest, and in order to meet this class of trade we are compelled to buy and sell for cash. Everything in the hardware line is advancing in price and manufacturers are greatly behind in filling orders, but notwithstanding these facts by buying and selling for cash and contracting for goods before advances for 1907 were made, we will be able to furnish our trade with goods at very little advance for sometime to come.

We are now receiving three carloads of field fencing, barbed wire and nails, all of which have advanced several times in the market since we made our contract, and we are prepared to make a liberal offer to our trade during the month of January, giving special prices far below the market value. Contracts must be made before February 1st, after which time the price will be advanced to the market value. Farmers contemplating buying field fence would find it to their interest to place their orders at once. Besides the advantage given in price our fencing this year is better galvanized and made with stronger stays. Please do not forget these special offers are for this month.

Respectfully yours,
44-5t J. M. DAVIS & SONS.

They're loadin' it on trains.
Veins acres long an' acres wide,
Each yieldin' up its pile.
While smaller veins an' arteries
Keep swellin' all the while.

Now, here's a picter meant to show
A crusher, drill an' pump;
You only buy the stock, you know,
An' set an' watch it jump.
I'm fairly achin' to invest

A Trade Trick.

"I'm told that Pennem, the author, has gone into the real estate business," remarked Large.

"Yes," replied Little. "He's building half a dozen houses. Curious thing too. He's making a specialty of the basements."

"Probably he's going to advertise them as the six best cellars."—Woman's Home Companion.

Her Memory.

Gayley—You haven't had occasion to accuse me of playing poker for two years.

Mrs. Gayley—Three years, my dear.

Gayley—How do you know it's three years?

Mrs. Gayley—Because I've worn this dress that long, and I got it the last time I caught you.—Catholic Standard and Times.

In Harmony.

Gunner—I met that swell Miss Flasher and her swell French poodle on the Boulevard the other morning. She gave me a haughty bow.

Guyer—And what did the dog do?

Gunner—Why, he gave me a haughty "bowlow!"—Detroit Tribune.

She Trimmed Him.

"Have you heard how Hawks was trimmed?"

"No."

"The courts have ordered him to pay $25,000 for breach of promise to that pretty little manicure lady he used to tell us about."—Judge.

Anything to Be Obliging.

Old Lady—I guess this is the last pair of shoes you'll sell me, Mr. Johnson.

Shoeman—Oh, I hope you'll wear out a great deal of shoe leather yet.

Old Lady—No. I have one foot in the grave already.

Shoeman—Well, we would be glad to sell you shoes for the other foot, ma'am.—Sketch.

She Didn't Think.

Mrs. Gunbusta—What size rooms are there in this flat?

Real Estate Agent—About 3 by 4.

Mrs. Gunbusta — They wouldn't be quite large enough, because my husband has a 5 by 7 camera.—New York Press.

Clever Children.

Fond Father—Well, professor, how are my children getting on in their studies?

Professor—Finely. Arthur is a very clever boy, and Mary is too.—Lippincott's Magazine.

Atmosphere.

Mr. Ant—Bill Moth is going around telling people he feels like an actor.

Mr. Fly—Well, he ought to feel that way. He has been living in a heavy tragedian's fur overcoat six months.—Chicago News.

A New One.

The Old Bird—My eyes must be getting poor. I can't see the wires on which those birds are sitting.

The Young Bird—Your eyes are all right. That's a wireless telegraph.—New York Life.

A Desired Reform.

Mrs. Bloodblood—I told the grocer that unless he stopped drinking he'd lose all his business.

Mr. Bloodblood—That was a gen' hint for him to give up [illegible] weigh.—Judge.

Gone.

"Herr Huber, come quick! Immediately. Your wife has suffocated herself with gas."

Huber—Heavens! There'll be another gas bill to pay! [illegible] blatt.

A Contradiction.

"Money makes the mare go," said the man who quotes.

"Not always," answered young Mrs. Torkins; "not if it's Charley's money that is bet on the mare."—Washington Star.

You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.

A BOSS-RIDDEN PARTY.

Mr. I. Freeman Rasin, Baltimore's Democratic boss, who had been in apparently vain quest for candidates for mayor and other offices, to be voted for at the municipal election in May, is indisposed and his physicians have ordered him to desist from taking further part in the business. It is presumable, however, that he had decided upon his men before he decided to retire from exercising his prerogative as party dictator, as Ex-Governor Frank Brown, who has also been engaged in candidate hunting, has announced the selection of a ticket to be supported by the adherents of the organization and, as a matter of course, nominated. This ticket is as follows: For Mayor, Mr. J. Barry Mahool; President Second Branch City Council, Mr. George N. Numsen; Comptroller, Mr. Harry F. Hooper. From reports, generally, nothing can be said in derogation of these gentlemen, except that they are willing to become the representatives of the Democratic machine. They will not become candidates by the untrammeled will of the Democratic voters. The Democratic party of Baltimore is boss-ridden and there is little doubt that the ticket named will be successful at the primaries.

Probably the other aspirants for nominations will withdraw from the contest. Mr. W. Cabell Bruce, one of them, had already made public his withdrawal when Gov. Brown's ticket was announced. Mr. George Stewart Brown, another of the aspirants for the Mayoralty nomination, shows fight, but will probably retreat under fire. State Senator Linthicum, who has made a gallant contest, may also find it convenient to subside, as he cannot fail to realize that his party is thoroughly dominated by the Boss spirit. There are many Independent Democrats in Baltimore, but the character of the men selected by the bosses will probably make them acquiesce in their action. The men who dominate the Democratic machine are cunning politicians and have been able, on numerous occasions, to "pull the wool" over the eyes of the Independents. It will be no surprise if they shall do so again.

OUR NAVAL STRENGTH.

The United States stands third in the world's navies. When the talk of a possible war with Japan was uppermost it was thought prudent to take an account of stock and this was done by the officials of the Navy Department, who found that the United States not only stands ahead of Japan in matter of naval tonnage, but if all the ships now building in the two navies were completed she still would occupy the same relative position. Japan is building and planning many new powerful ships, but so is the United States. It would be only a question as to which could construct her vessel the quicker and the United States having more money doubtless could rush the vessels to completion much faster.

There never was any serious danger. War is an expensive luxury and Japan, having just come out of a war that taxed her finances to the utmost is in no shape to fight any nation, much less the mightiest and most powerful in the bunch. The best basis for lasting peace is continual preparation for war.

Will Hereafter Give Out Information.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad company will, in the future, give out general information about the road and furnish authentic reports of accidents or wrecks, if the public has a plausible interest in such information. The officials of the Wheeling division on Tuesday afternoon received a letter from the head officials of the road at Baltimore, Md., notifying them to give out to newspapers all general information concerning the railroad. The letter did not give a detailed account of what was ment by "general information of the railroad," but mentioned promotions, accidents and wrecks. It stated, however, that when in doubt as to the advisibility of giving out certain kinds of informatoin, the general press agent should be communicated with and his decision abided by. The communication stated that this policy had been deemed advisable as newspapers all over the country, unable to get authentic information concerning railroad accidents and wrecks, generally greatly exaggerated the facts and criticised the railroad company.

FIFTY-NINTH CONGRESS COMES TO AN END

Roosevelt and Cannon Pat Each Other on Back.

WASHINGTON, March 4.—The President this morning signed the Aldrich financial bill thus making it a law. It goes into effect immediately. The fifty-ninth Congress, declared by President Roosevelt and Speaker Cannon to be the greatest Congress in history in connection with legislation for the people's interests expired at noon today. It was characteristic in its Congressional demise. As the hour of noon approached, the House gave itself up to song and mirth.

The Senate adjourned in a manner more befitting the dignity of the upper branch of Congress. During the session, among the important measures passed were the railroad rate bill, pure food bill, railroad hours of service bill, measures prohibiting campaign contribution by national banks and corporations, meat inspection bill, creation of the new State, Oklahoma, and many others of value to the country at large.

In the Senate there were offered 8,600 bills and in the House 26,000. It was with desks almost clear that the house, and Senate met for the closing session today.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

What Is Transpiring at the National Capital.

A new building for the bureau of engraving and printing, to cost $3,000,000, has been provided for in a bill which was recently reported by the house committee on public buildings and grounds.

The overcrowding of machinery and employees has reached to every room in the building. Notwithstanding the ever increasing demand for work officials say it is a question under present condition if the limit of capacity has not been reached.

The density is greater on the third floor, where the main hand press room is located. Here the conditions are said to be more aggravated than in any other quarter of the building. In continuous lines the presses by necessity are placed against each other, and the aisle between the lines by actual measurement are sixteen inches wide. In these narrow spaces the printers and their women assistants work, the men performing the hardest kind of manual labor.

The women who work in these surroundings are mostly young, between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five. It is the policy of the bureau not to employ women as assistants who are more than thirty-five years old. The nature of the work requires that it shall be done quickly, and the person doing it must possess agility of mind and body. It is not unusual for them to fall in a faint at their work.

A hospital, with a physician in charge, has been established, but for want of space even this is inadequately equipped.

The new amusement hall to be erected at the Government Hospital for the Insane, so far as modern construction and design are concerned, will be Washington's most up to date playhouse.

The designs show a building which will be practically a theater, although it will be known as an amusement hall. It will have every convenience, feature of equipment and advantage in design that is known in theatrical architecture. The hall will be devoted to performances given for the patients at the hospital and will cost $75,000 to build.

Beside being absolutely fireproof in construction, the building will be equipped with every known contrivance to kill flames in case a fire should ever start. Among these are the water curtain, asbestos curtain, automatic sprinklers, and automatic skylight. The hall will seat 700 people in the main auditorium and 300 additional in the balcony, which will be used by guests.

In designing the stage every detail of modern equipment has been given careful thought and study, with the end in view to have as complete and "professionally" correct a stage as possible. There is to be a brick fire wall between the stage and the auditorium, and the stage opening is to be provided with an asbestos curtain, curtain and drops to be hung upon a steel girdiron, with iron blocks and wire ropes.

Suspended underneath the girdiron there will be an automatic sprinkler, so arranged as to play on the asbestos curtain, all drops and all parts of the stage.

This is an essential requirement in modern theater construction, as many fires occur from defective wires in drop loft and often gain considerable headway before being discovered.

Exquisite orchids have been imported from the Philippines for the White House conservatories. When Mrs. Roosevelt presides over the post Lenten gayeties society at the capital will have the pleasure of admiring these recent acquisitions. Since coming to the White House Mrs. Roosevelt has clung persistently to the imposing flower known as the "Lady Finger" orchid. The variety was a gift to Police Commissioner Bingham of New York while major domo of the White House from Joseph Chamberlain of Birmingham, England, who beguiles his leisure from political cares by collecting orchids. The flowers combines most gorgeous shades of deep purple to pale violet. Because of its rarity and costliness it cannot become a popular flower. Mrs. Roosevelt never appeared at a state function, whether it was White House reception, inauguration ball or a cabinet dinner, without a large cluster of these orchids in her belt. The Philippine orchids will show more yellow than purple, and they are of long bell shape.

Plans have been prepared for extensive improvements to be made on the boys' building of the Young Men's Christian Association on G street near Seventeenth.

The building, which was the quarters of the whole association before its new home was erected on the property adjoining, will be remodeled and renovated throughout. When the improvements are complete the boys' quarters will be as modern and as well equipped in every way as the newer building.

All sorts and conditions of people come to the White House in a steady stream to beg the president and the members of the cabinet to make speeches in various parts of the country. Anything from the annual meeting of a state bar association to the anniversary of a stateman's death brings a delegation to Washington looking for a "big gun" to make the speech of the day. Not one-tenth of these requests can be granted. President Roosevelt tells all the delegations that come to him that if the cabinet officers accepted one-third of the invitations they have to speak the government business would be sadly neglected.

CARL SCHOFIELD.

THE HOMEMAKER.

Home is generally what the wife and mother makes it. In the home all that is characteristically womanly unfolds and flourishes. Home without woman is a misnomer for woman makes the home and the home is just what she makes it. If she is ignorant and illiterate, home partakes of these qualities; if she is immoral, her home cannot be the abode of virtue, if she is coarse, refinement does not dwell in her home. On the other hand, if the woman of the home is pure, cultured and refined, these qualities will characterize the home of which she is the center. How important then, that, in the education and training of our girls, those things be not neglected which will fit them to take their places as real homemakers and imbue them with the right ideas of life and its duties.

The character that a young woman takes with her in marriage is her real dower. If her dower can be reckoned in money or property only, no matter how much it may be, poor indeed will be the husband, and impovished the children. But if she possesses gentleness, love, purity and self-denial, together with intelligence and capability, she is in herself a treasure of treasures to all the members of the home circle.

What Makes A Man.

Ages ago it was announced that "Man is wonderfully and fearfully made." It was supposed that reference was thus made to the heart, the lungs, and other parts of the human body which no man has been able to duplicate, but now come certain German scientists and declare that material for a man weighing 150 pounds may be found in 1200 hens' eggs. They say that the normal human body has in it the iron needed for seven large nails, the fat for fourteen pounds of candles, the carbon for sixty-four gross of crayons, phosphorous enough for 820,000 matches, twenty spoons of salt, and fifty lumps of sugar. Reduced to a fluid, they assert that the average man would yield ninety-eight cubic meters of illuminating gas and sufficient hydrogen to fill a balloon capable of lifting 155 pounds.

We are not prepared to dispute this interesting announcement, and the information to be derived therefrom is out of the ordinary. It has been generally supposed that a man's character and the quality of his usefulness were determined by the right development of his intellect, but the German scientists have upset this theory. We know now a better reason for the politician's "gas;" the crayons in the human make-up account for the success of men of "mark;" and the "shining lights" in a community are plentifully supplied with candles. It must be aggravating to these investigators to find that they cannot take several cases of eggs, a box of candles, crayons, matches, a handful of nails, with a little sugar and salt and produce a man from the mixture.

A Correction.

In the account of the death of Mrs. Mary C. Gilpin which was published in this paper last week three annoying errors were made. Mrs. Gilpin's husband died five years ago. She was ill for a period of ten weeks and leaves but one daughter, Mrs J. W. Reams, of near Mountain Lake Park.

NATIONAL BANKS ARE NUMEROUS

Comptroller of Currency Says They Number 6315.

WASHINGTON, March 2—The Comptroller of the Currency has issued the following statement:

"At the close of business January 31 1907, there were in existence 6315 national banking associations, with authorized capital stock of $867,776,275; bonds on deposit to secure circulation, $553,253,550; circulation outstanding secured by bonds, $540,698,574; circulation secured by deposit of lawful money, $46.498,995; total out standing circulation, $596,197,569.

"Under the act of Congress approved March 14, 1900, authorizing banks with a minimum capital of $25,000, there have been chartered 2,124 associations, their authorized capital stock being $55,380,500. During the same period there were organized under the act of June 3, 1864 1,141 banks, with capital stock of $133,487,800, making the total number of banks chartered from March 14, 1900, to January 31, 1907, 3,265, with capital of $188,868,300. Of these banks, 366, with authorized capital of $25,236,880, were conversions of State banks, 1,062, with capital of $67,074,000, successions of State and private banks, and the remainder, 1,837, with capital of $96,557,500, were banks of primary organization.

"During the month of January there were chartered 40 banks, with capital of $3,105,000, twenty-five of which were banks of primary organization, six reorganizations of State and private banks, and nine conversions of State banks."

Stallions for Sale.

We have a pair of thoroughbred registered Percheron Stallions, aged four and five years respectively, which we will sell at an exceptionally low price to any Garrett county stockman. These horses are kind, gentle and thoroughly broken to both double and single harness and weigh 1800 pounds each. Will sell one or both animals. A special price to purchaser will be made upon guarantee that the horses will be kept in Garrett county for stock purposes at least two years from date of sale. These horses were bred and raised on Bond Bros. stock farm in Jefferson county, Pa., and belong to the famous Brilliant family which stands at the head of the Percheron stud. For further particulars call on or address

N. U. BOND, Bond, Md.

Pure Soap as a Tonic.

Don't be afraid of being too clean or washing away your skin with too frequent use of soap. Pure soap is a tonic and, if need be, it can be used twice a day on the entire body with no other than beneficial effect. The cold bath is not a cleansing bath.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is:

AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

A BOSS-RIDDEN PARTY.

Mr. I. Freeman Rasin, Baltimore's Democratic boss, who had been in apparently vain quest for candidates for mayor and other offices, to be voted for at the municipal election in May, is indisposed and his physicians have ordered him to desist from taking further part in the business. It is presumable, however, that he had decided upon his men before he decided to retire from exercising his prerogative as party dictator, as Ex-Governor Frank Brown, who has also been engaged in candidate hunting, has announced the selection of a ticket to be supported by the adherents of the organization and, as a matter of course, nominated. This ticket is as follows: For Mayor, Mr. J. Barry Mahool; President Second Branch City Council, Mr. George N. Numsen; Comptroller, Mr. Harry F. Hooper. From reports, generally, nothing can be said in derogation of these gentlemen, except that they are willing to become the representatives of the Democratic machine. They will not become candidates by the untrammeled will of the Democratic voters. The Democratic party of Baltimore is boss-ridden and there is little doubt that the ticket named will be successful at the primaries.

Probably the other aspirants for nominations will withdraw from the contest. Mr. W. Cabell Bruce, one of them, had already made public his withdrawal when Gov. Brown's ticket was announced. Mr. George Stewart Brown, another of the aspirants for the Mayoralty nomination, shows fight, but will probably retreat under fire. State Senator Linthicum, who has made a gallant contest, may also find it convenient to subside, as he cannot fail to realize that his party is thoroughly dominated by the Boss spirit. There are many Independent Democrats in Baltimore, but the character of the men selected by the bosses will probably make them acquiesce in their action. The men who dominate the Democratic machine are cunning politicians and have been able, on numerous occasions, to "pull the wool" over the eyes of the Independents. It will be no surprise if they shall do so again.

OUR NAVAL STRENGTH.

The United States stands third in the world's navies. When the talk of a possible war with Japan was uppermost it was thought prudent to take an account of stock and this was done by the officials of the Navy Department, who found that the United States not only stands ahead of Japan in matter of naval tonnage, but if all the ships now building in the two navies were completed she still would occupy the same relative position. Japan is building and planning many new powerful ships, but so is the United States. It would be only a question as to which could construct her vessel the quicker and the United States having more money doubtless could rush the vessels to completion much faster.

There never was any serious danger. War is an expensive luxury and Japan, having just come out of a war that taxed her finances to the utmost is in no shape to fight any nation, much less the mightiest and most powerful in the bunch. The best basis for lasting peace is continual preparation for war.

Will Hereafter Give Out Information.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad company will, in the future, give out general information about the road and furnish authentic reports of accidents or wrecks, if the public has a plausible interest in such information. The officials of the Wheeling division on Tuesday afternoon received a letter from the head officials of the road at Baltimore, Md., notifying them to give out to newspapers all general information concerning the railroad. The letter did not give a detailed account of what was ment by "general information of the railroad," but mentioned promotions, accidents and wrecks. It stated, however, that when in doubt as to the advisibility of giving out certain kinds of informatoin, the general press agent should be communicated with and his decision abided by. The communication stated that this policy had been deemed advisable as newspapers all over the country, unable to get authentic information concerning railroad accidents and wrecks, generally greatly exaggerated the facts and criticised the railroad company.

FIFTY-NINTH CONGRESS COMES TO AN END

Roosevelt and Cannon Pat Each Other on Back.

WASHINGTON, March 4.—The President this morning signed the Aldrich financial bill thus making it a law. It goes into effect immediately. The fifty-ninth Congress, declared by President Roosevelt and Speaker Cannon to be the greatest Congress in history in connection with legislation for the people's interests expired at noon today. It was characteristic in its Congressional demise. As the hour of noon approached, the House gave itself up to song and mirth.

The Senate adjourned in a manner more befitting the dignity of the upper branch of Congress. During the session, among the important measures passed were the railroad rate bill, pure food bill, railroad hours of service bill, measures prohibiting campaign contribution by national banks and corporations, meat inspection bill, creation of the new State, Oklahoma, and many others of value to the country at large.

In the Senate there were offered 8,600 bills and in the House 26,000. It was with desks almost clear that the house, and Senate met for the closing session today.

WASHINGTON LETTER.

What Is Transpiring at the National Capital.

A new building for the bureau of engraving and printing, to cost $3,000,000, has been provided for in a bill which was recently reported by the house committee on public buildings and grounds.

The overcrowding of machinery and employees has reached to every room in the building. Notwithstanding the ever increasing demand for work officials say it is a question under present condition if the limit of capacity has not been reached.

The density is greater on the third floor, where the main hand press room is located. Here the conditions are said to be more aggravated than in any other quarter of the building. In continuous lines the presses by necessity are placed against each other, and the aisle between the lines by actual measurement are sixteen inches wide. In these narrow spaces the printers and their women assistants work, the men performing the hardest kind of manual labor.

The women who work in these surroundings are mostly young, between the ages of seventeen and twenty-five. It is the policy of the bureau not to employ women as assistants who are more than thirty-five years old. The nature of the work requires that it shall be done quickly, and the person doing it must possess agility of mind and body. It is not unusual for them to fall in a faint at their work.

A hospital, with a physician in charge, has been established, but for want of space even this is inadequately equipped.

The new amusement hall to be erected at the Government Hospital for the Insane, so far as modern construction and design are concerned, will be Washington's most up to date playhouse.

The designs show a building which will be practically a theater, although it will be known as an amusement hall. It will have every convenience, feature of equipment and advantage in design that is known in theatrical architecture. The hall will be devoted to performances given for the patients at the hospital and will cost $75,000 to build.

Beside being absolutely fireproof in construction, the building will be equipped with every known contrivance to kill flames in case a fire should ever start. Among these are the water curtain, asbestos curtain, automatic sprinklers, and automatic skylight. The hall will seat 700 people in the main auditorium and 300 additional in the balcony, which will be used by guests.

In designing the stage every detail of modern equipment has been given careful thought and study, with the end in view to have as complete and "professionally" correct a stage as possible. There is to be a brick fire wall between the stage and the auditorium, and the stage opening is to be provided with an asbestos curtain, curtain and drops to be hung upon a steel girdiron, with iron blocks and wire ropes.

Suspended underneath the girdiron there will be an automatic sprinkler, so arranged as to play on the asbestos curtain and drops and all parts of the stage.

This is an essential requirement in modern theater construction, as many fires occur from defective wires in drop loft and often gain considerable headway before being discovered.

Exquisite orchids have been imported from the Philippines for the White House conservatories. When Mrs. Roosevelt presides over the post Lenten gayeties society at the capital will have the pleasure of admiring these recent acquisitions. Since coming to the White House Mrs. Roosevelt has clung persistently to the imposing flower known as the "Lady Finger" orchid. The variety was a gift to Police Commissioner Bingham of New York while major domo of the White House from Joseph Chamberlain of Birmingham, England, who beguiles his leisure from political cares by collecting orchids. The flowers combines most gorgeous shades of deep purple to pale violet. Because of its rarity and costliness it cannot become a popular flower. Mrs. Roosevelt never appeared at a state function, whether it was White House reception, inauguration ball or a cabinet dinner, without a large cluster of these orchids in her belt. The Philippine orchids will show more yellow than purple, and they are of long bell shape.

Plans have been prepared for extensive improvements to be made on the boys' building of the Young Men's Christian Association on G street near Seventeenth.

The building, which was the quarters of the whole association before its new home was erected on the property adjoining, will be remodeled and renovated throughout. When the improvements are complete the boys' quarters will be as modern and as well equipped in every way as the newer building.

All sorts and conditions of people come to the White House in a steady stream to beg the president and the members of the cabinet to make speeches in various parts of the country. Anything from the annual meeting of a state bar association to the anniversary of a stateman's death brings a delegation to Washington looking for a "big gun" to make the speech of the day. Not one-tenth of these requests can be granted. President Roosevelt tells all the delegations that come to him that if the cabinet officers accepted one-third of the invitations they have to speak the government business would be sadly neglected.

CARL SCHOFIELD.

THE HOMEMAKER.

Home is generally what the wife and mother makes it. In the home all that is characteristically womanly unfolds and flourishes. Home without woman is a misnomer for woman makes the home and the home is just what she makes it. If she is ignorant and illiterate, home partakes of these qualities; if she is immoral, her home cannot be the abode of virtue, if she is coarse, refinement does not dwell in her home. On the other hand, if the woman of the home is pure, cultured and refined, these qualities will characterize the home of which she is the center. How important then, that, in the education and training of our girls, those things be not neglected which will fit them to take their places as real homemakers and imbue them with the right ideas of life and its duties.

The character that a young woman takes with her in marriage is her real dower. If her dower can be reckoned in money or property only, no matter how much it may be, poor indeed will be the husband, and impovished the children. But if she possesses gentleness, love, purity and self-denial, together with intelligence and capability, she is in herself a treasure of treasures to all the members of the home circle.

What Makes A Man.

Ages ago it was announced that "Man is wonderfully and fearfully made." It was supposed that reference was thus made to the heart, the lungs, and other parts of the human body which no man has been able to duplicate, but now come certain German scientists and declare that material for a man weighing 150 pounds may be found in 1200 hens' eggs. They say that the normal human body has in it the iron needed for seven large nails, the fat for fourteen pounds of candles, the carbon for sixty-four gross of crayons, phosphorous enough for 820,000 matches, twenty spoons of salt, and fifty lumps of sugar. Reduced to a fluid, they assert that the average man would yield ninety-eight cubic meters of illuminating gas and sufficient hydrogen to fill a balloon capable of lifting 155 pounds.

We are not prepared to dispute this interesting announcement, and the information to be derived therefrom is out of the ordinary. It has been generally supposed that a man's character and the quality of his usefulness were determined by the right development of his intellect, but the German scientists have upset this theory. We know now a better reason for the politician's "gas;" the crayons in the human make-up account for the success of men of "mark;" and the "shining lights" in a community are plentifully supplied with candles. It must be aggravating to these investigators to find that they cannot take several cases of eggs, a box of candles, crayons, matches, a handful of nails, with a little sugar and salt and produce a man from the mixture.

A Correction.

In the account of the death of Mrs. Mary C. Gilpin which was published in this paper last week three annoying errors were made. Mrs. Gilpin's husband died five years ago. She was ill for a period of ten weeks and leaves but one daughter, Mrs J. W. Reams, of near Mountain Lake Park.

NATIONAL BANKS ARE NUMEROUS

Comptroller of Currency Says They Number 6315.

WASHINGTON, March 2—The Comptroller of the Currency has issued the following statement:

"At the close of business January 31 1907, there were in existence 6315 national banking associations, with authorized capital stock of $867,776,275; bonds on deposit to secure circulation, $553,253,550; circulation outstanding secured by bonds, $540,698,574; circulation secured by deposit of lawful money, $46.498,995; total out standing circulation, $596,197,569.

"Under the act of Congress approved March 14, 1900, authorizing banks with a minimum capital of $25,000, there have been chartered 2,124 associations, their authorized capital stock being $55,380,500. During the same period there were organized under the act of June 3, 1864 1,141 banks, with capital stock of $133,487,800, making the total number of banks chartered from March 14, 1900, to January 31, 1907, 3,265, with capital of $188,868,300. Of these banks, 366, with authorized capital of $25,236,880, were conversions of State banks, 1,062, with capital of $67,074,000, successions of State and private banks, and the remainder, 1,837, with capital of $96,557,500, were banks of primary organization.

"During the month of January there were chartered 40 banks, with capital of $3,105,000, twenty-five of which were banks of primary organization, six reorganizations of State and private banks, and nine conversions of State banks."

Stallions for Sale.

We have a pair of thoroughbred registered Percheron Stallions, aged four and five years respectively, which we will sell at an exceptionally low price to any Garrett county stockman. These horses are kind, gentle and thoroughly broken to both double and single harness and weigh 1800 pounds each. Will sell one or both animals. A special price to purchaser will be made upon guarantee that the horses will be kept in Garrett county for stock purposes at least two years from date of sale. These horses were bred and raised on Bond Bros. stock farm in Jefferson county, Pa., and belong to the famous Brilliant family which stands at the head of the Percheron stud. For further particulars call on or address

N. U. BOND, Bond, Md.

Pure Soap as a Tonic.

Don't be afraid of being too clean or washing away your skin with too frequent use of soap. Pure soap is a tonic and, if need be, it can be used twice a day on the entire body with no other than beneficial effect. The cold bath is not a cleansing bath.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is: AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside business, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

Prof. Edward A. Browning, of Oakland, spent several hours in town last Saturday with G. Dud. Hocking.—Frostburg Journal.

The attention of our readers is called to the change of advertisement of the Garrett National Bank of Oakland, which appears in this paper today.

State Senator W. McCulloh Brown is in Oakland attending the sessions of the Farmers' Institute now being held here. He expects to leave for Baltimore tonight.

The roads were so rough in a neighboring community after the mud dried up that folks with false teeth were compelled to take them out of their mouth before starting to town in a wagon.

Mr. Hurley Miller, of near Sunnyside, was in the city Monday when he made this office a brief business visit. Mr. Miller is one Garrett county's youngest agriculturalists and is also one of her most prosperous and enthusiastic.

Miss Bessie Littman, who visited friends in Morgantown and Fairmont for ten days, returned to her home in Oakland last Thursday afternoon. During Miss Littman's absence from Oakland her position as C. & P. operator was acceptably filled by Miss Corinne Manges.

Mr. Herman Creutzburg left Oakland for the west yesterday morning. He will first go to a point in Washington and from there to Pocatello, Idaho, where he has mining interests which at present promise to pay handsomely. Mr. Creutzburg's departure from Oakland is greatly regretted by his many friends. For the present Mrs. Creutzburg will remain in Oakland but will join her husbond in Idaho early in the spring.

Justice W. A. Harvey, the well known merchant of Gormania, brought his mother, Mrs. J. L. Harvey, here yesterday, to see Dr. Jas. T. Johnson, who will perform an operation, which, however, will not be of a serious nature. —Cumberland News.

Gilead Broadwater, of Grantsville, here Monday, the Journal asked what provocation he could furnish that would justify "putting him in the paper." "Just say," said he, "I brought a load of hay down!" Then, reflectively, he asked—"kin ye git me and a load of hay in that paper?"—Frostburg Journal.

Dr. John E. Legge will leave Oakland on Friday morning for New York City to be absent for a period of six weeks which time he will spend in the New York Post-Graduate School of Medicine and Surgery to better qualify himself for the practice of his profession.

"Times are hard" to be sure, but what's the use of climbing up on a dry goods box and day after day proclaiming it to the world this old threadbare stereotyped assertion. We some times think that times ought to be still more stringent with some of these fellows. Did it ever occur to you that the genuine hustler rarely if ever complains of hard times?

Judge Henry G. Sanders will sell at public auction at his farm south of Oakland on March 27th, beginning at nine o'clock, grain, hay, household goods, etc. Judge Sanders recently purchased a small body of land near Mountain Lake Park and will retire from active farm life immediately after he disposes of his personal property.

An exchange says that alcohol will remove grass stains from summer clothes. The exchange is right. It will also remove summer clothes and also spring and winter clothes, not only from the man who drinks it but also from his wife and children. It will remove household furniture from the house and eatables from the pantry; the smiles from the face of his wife, and the happiness from his home. As a remover of things alcohol has few equals.

Be natural. Do not try to impress people with your importance. If you are really important they will find it out. If you are of no account you will not deceive anyone by acting as though great interests rested in your keeping. The day of pomposity is past, we hope never to return. More people than ever before are intelligent and able to judge those with whom they come in contact. This means that they are able to judge you and place a true rather than a false estimate on your abilities.

Earl Friend, son of Mr. and Mrs. Lafayette Friend, of near Deer Park, has accepted a position in Saline, Michigan, as head shepherd over the large sheep ranch of Mr. A. A. Wood and son. Earl is one of Deer Park's promising young men and has been in the employ of Col. Truesdal for the past six years. He left on train No. 7 Monday night for Saline and was accompanied as far as Oakland by his mother and a large number of his particular friends, who all join in wishing him the best of success.

Mr. Charles H. Brown, who has been engaged in Oakland for a year or more in the shoe and furnishing business, having rooms in the First National Bank building, is packing his stock of goods preparatory to removing to Brownsville, Pa., for which place he will leave some time next week where he will engage in the same line of business as in Oakland. The room being vacated by Mr. Brown will be occupied beginning on April 1st by Mr. E. A. Weimer who will vacate the Little building on Third street on that date.

Every time the closet of your neighbor is opened a little do you strain your neck to peek, and then afterward strain your tongue in talking about it. Do you ever stop to think that some day a tragedy may take up its abode in your home? Can't you get it into your head that some day the tongue of slander may cut you like a sharp sword and the whispers of your neighbors be as vinegar on your wounds? Misfortune and disgrace may have overtaken your neighbor, but it does not become you to get on the housetops and shout it out to the world. You will not be called upon to pay for nor answer for any of the sins of your neighbor. You have all you can tend to to pay for your own indiscretions. Some day one near and dear to you may fall—the prison walls may open to a son or the scarlet letter of eternity blight a daughter. When a home is in mourning over a tragedy the best thing you can do is to keep your mouth shut unless you can say something that will come as a rift in the clouds. Then again, you know you may be no better than your neighbor. The only difference is that your neighbor was caught and you, up-to-date have kept the sun light away. Be charitable, my friend, for you know not the day nor the hour when the blight will appear in your sacred circle.

Effect of New Pension Law

Many veterans are taking advantage of the McCumber pension bill which become a law February 6.

The law gives to any person who served 90 days or more in the military or naval service of the United States during the civil war and 60 days in the war with Mexico and was honorable discharged therefrom and who has reached the prescribed age, a pension ranging from $12 per month to $20 per month, according to his age. Such persons when they arrive at the age of 62 years are granted a pension of $12 a month, 70 years, $15 a month, and 75 years, $20 a month.

The only qualifications required aside from the length of service and honorable discharge is the required age. The only soldiers who have reached the necessary age and are excluded from this law are those who do not have honorable discharges and have served less than 90 days.

The law does not apply to veterans of the Spanish-American war.

LARGE ENGINE WRECKED.

Crellin Mill Forced To Shut Down Until New Machinery Is Installed.

The large two hundred and twenty-five horse power engine used by the Kendall Lumber Company at Crellin to furnish power to operate the mill at that point "stripped" itself on Monday of this week, entirely wrecking the ponderous machine and necessitating the installation of a new engine before operations on the mill can be resumed.

Mill Foreman George Brown immediately after the accident occured left for a point in the east where he purchased for immediate delivery a much larger engine than the one wrecked, which will be forwarded within a day or two and work on the plant is expected to be resumed by the 20th inst.

At the time the engine flew to pieces several men were in the engine room of the mill, all of whom escaped without injury.

As a result of the accident half a hundred men will be without employment until repairs can be made.

THE DEATH RECORD.

MRS. ARMACETI GARLITZ.

Mrs. Armaceti Garlitz was a good christian woman, having joined the Methodist Episcopal church in Friendsville many years ago, in which she lived an examplary life for many years. She was also a good neighbor and highly esteemed by her many friends. She was a regular attendant upon all the means of grace held in her church whenever her health permitted. Not being blessed with any children her husband, Basil Garlitz, is left with no one to cheer his life in the home. We therefore join our sympathy and prayers with those of his other friends, in these hours of deep sorrow to him and of whose wife it may aptly be said: "Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord; for they rest from their labours and their works do follow them." She departed this life at the age of forty-three Feb. 25, 1907, when she went "to be forever with the Lord."

W. MAJIOR LISTER.

SIMON CATON, JR.

Mr. Simon Caton, Jr., died at his home in Garrett county about four miles west of Frostburg on Friday afternoon from diphtheria, at the age of thirty-five years. Mr. Caton's father died just a few months ago and three weeks ago he buried a young son. He is survived by his wife and three children. The funeral took place Sunday afternoon from the home. Interment was made in the cemetery at Greenville.

Lumberman Accidentally Killed.

George Lough, a lumberman, was instantly killed at Bemis, W. Va., Monday, while standing near a log loader. The cable, drawing three heavy logs up the hill, parted, the broken ends striking his forehead and crushing his skull. Lough was soon to have been married.

BLIND MAN CONQUERED HIS GREAT INFIRMITY

How Joseph Warnick Earned a Living Despite His Total Loss of Vision.

The death of Joseph Warnick, of Barton, Allegany county, commonly called "Blind Joe," which occurred on the 27th day of February, ends the career of a remarkable character in many respects. He was born November 7th, 1835, in what is called The Swamp, in Garrett county. His father's name was Joseph Warnick and his mother's maiden name was Elizabeth Fazenbaker. There were eight in the family, three brothers and five sisters, all now dead excepting one or two. All his life has been spent in Garrett and Allegany counties, and he had never been farther away from home than to Cumberland.

From his earliest recollection his eyesight was poor, and at no time of his life was he able to see perfectly. Some time in early manhood the sight of one eye was completely destroyed by an accident. Up until he was thirty years of age he did all kinds of work, such as lumbering, farm work, made shingles and anything that came to hand. It was while making shingles that the loss of the remaining eye occurred, about 40 years ago. To give it in his own words he said: "I was making shingles on a hill side, and had gotten up to get some more wood, and slipped and fell on a locus stump which had been broken off and left some sharp splinters sticking up, and one of them ran into my eye."

He was never, at any time, a solicitor of charity. He grubbed and cleared land, made saw logs, worked for the farmers, could pitch hay, mow, rake and bind grain, make shingles and in fact do many things as well as a person that could see. For years before the pine timber was exhausted he made shingles during the winter months which he took to the stores, and traded for such commodities as his necessities required. He could make from five to six hundred per day, and found a ready sale for them at $5 and $6 per thousand. There was never any difficulty in disposing of his product as he had a reputation for making a first class shingle, and there is no doubt that there are houses in Lonaconing and Barton today that are covered with the product of his hand. After the shingle wood was exhausted it was necessary for him to turn his attention in other directions for the means of a livelihood. This was accomplished by bringing into action his natural mechanical abilities and he began the making of pick handles. This occupation he followed for years, and he was a familiar figure on the streets of Barton and neighboring towns with a bundle of handles for sale to the miners, or at one of the stores. That his product was first class is attested by the price he would receive; viz, 15 cents, when the turned or factory handle could be had for 10 cents.

It is certainly remarkable the ability he had in getting around in the woods. He would start out to the mountains in search of a suitable tree for handles, and when one was found that suited him, it was soon felled by the stroke of his ax and the part that was suitable was chopped off and carried to his shack where it was worked up. It is said of him that he could go for miles in the thickest of the woods and never get lost. He could invariably tell the direction a tree would fall and could chop it so that it would fall in the right direction. In his he was never known to make a mistake. Some times it would be necessary to leave an implement. No difference how far in the mountain it was, he could return to the exact spot and find the article he had hidden. In many respects he was a privileged character. The farmers usually gave him permission to take such trees as he wanted.

Owing to his poor eyesight in his younger days, he never yearned to read; but like many of the people living in the mountain regions, he had a musical sense, and took to the violin as naturally as a duck would take to water. He was quite a musician in his way, and would often hold picnics at which he would be the chief and only musician. Many are the stories told of "Blind Joe's" picnics and the dancing to the strains of "Sugar in the Gourd," "Monie Musk," "Fisher's Hornpipe," and many of the old-time melodies that Joe would execute to the merriment of his guests.

These picnics, he always made a source of revenue, as well as an opportunity to display his musical accomplishments and every one that attended was expected to spend his money liberally; if he did not, he soon lost his standing with the host. But if they were thoughtful and brought a bottle along, and treated Joe liberally, they were ever after in special favor. Several years ago Joe was living in an old shack of a house and one evening he concluded to give the boys a dance. The guests arrived on schedule time and, as usual, one of them brought an extra bottle for the host to liven things up a bit. Everything passed off as usual, and when the guests departed, Joe went to his "bunk" to sleep. Some hours later he awoke to find the house in fames. He managed to get out: lost all his effects, but managed to save the remainder of his bottle of whiskey. He was not known as a habitual drinker, but was very fond of the "cup that cheers," and had it not been for his miserly disposition, there might have been a different story to tell.

He was never married and lived as a recluse for years; doing his own cooking and baking. People living near him would often take him dainties in the way of pies, cakes and such things, as only the good housewife knows how to prepare. For these he was always thankful, but it is not known that he ever asked favors of any one, or encouraged the donations in any way.

After the burning of his house he moved to the shack in which he died, and which he built himself. It is the size and shape of an ordinary coal house, and in this he worked, cooked, ate and slept, and lived in squalor and filth until the infirmities of old age and disease closed the scene. In religious belief he was a Dunkard and was buried with the ceremonies of that faith in the I. O. O. F. cemetery at Moscow.

As stated before, he was never dependent upon charity, and this is true even in death. In recent years he managed to lay by a sufficient sum to give him a decent burial. This he placed in the Barton bank with instructions to be used for the necessary funeral expenses, so that he could die and leave no debts for others to pay.

Letter to C. Kimmell.
Oakland, Md.

Dear Sir: If you could get the exclusive sale of a coal that would give double heat and cost no more, you'd jump at it wouldn't you?

You'd control the trade for a hundred miles!

Devoe is like that among paints; a short ton is as good as a long one of any paint you can name; a gallon is worth more than two of many a popular paint.

Suppose you have painted your house about once in three years ever since it was new; you buy the same number of gallons Devoe, have a third of is left, and it wears six years. Count your costs.

$1.75 a gallon for paint; $3.50 a gallon for putting it on; you saved 5 gallons; $26.25 on this job. But you save the whole job of three years hence; about $75. Put 'em together; $100.

Can't reckon so accurately as that; but you see how it goes. Paint isn't alike any more than coal. How much more is coal worth than ¼ slate.

Yours truly,

16 F. W. DEVOE & CO.

Daniel O'Connell Moloney, Ally.

By M. J. PHILLIPS.

Copyright, 1907, by M. M. Cunningham.

Attired for the opera, Morgan Tremaine stepped into the elevator at the twelfth floor of the Alameda, where he had his apartments.

"Good evening, Daniel O'Connell Moloney," he said gravely to the knickerbockered and freckled elevator boy.

Daniel O'Connell grinned cheerfully and whistled through a gap in his front teeth by way of reply. They were sworn friends, the two.

At the tenth floor the car stopped, and the door slid back. Tremaine removed his hat ceremoniously. Mrs. Alderton Ten Eyke, also theaterward bound, large and determined in appearance, marched in. At sight of the young attorney she sniffed, a slight, ladylike, well bred sniff, but nevertheless a sniff. Miss Marjorie Ten Eyke, young and slender, dark eyed and lovable, followed her mother. She did not look at Tremaine, but the faintest hint of added color appeared for a moment in her smooth cheeks. Arthur Benscoter, caressing a fiercely upturned mustache, which emphasized his sparse five feet five, brought up the rear. Sixty-five inches are not impressive, but a hundred thousand dollars for every inch of it is rather a good average, which the militant Mrs. Ten Eyke fully appreciated.

So did Tremaine, with a hungry glance at his lovely former fiancee. When one is a struggling lawyer, just beginning to see light ahead after a two years' battle with callous New York, one gives due consideration to a half dozen millions, especially when the other fellow has them.

"Two months of it," mused Tremaine mournfully, despite his jaunty bearing, when he had reached the street. "Two months without a look or a nod or a smile—because I danced too much with that little Rivers girl! I was a fool to do it and a fool to quarrel over it with Mrs. Ten, on the lookout for Mammon every minute. In her eyes I am a 'briefless barrister,' as the English novels say. And little Benscoter isn't a man; he's just a bank—and a mustache. Marjorie can't like the fellow. Still constant pressure will have its effect sooner or later. If only something would come up to break the ice," and Tremaine got so interested in imagining perilous situations for the fair Marjorie, with himself as the rescuing hero, that he walked three squares beyond his theater.

THE CAR SEEMED TO DROP FROM BENEATH THEIR FEET.

The next morning he overslept and rushed to the elevator with an important engagement almost due.

"In a hurry, D. O'C. Moloney," he admonished the youth at the controller. "I'm so late now I haven't time to speak your full name."

Daniel O'Connell grinned and imitated a steam calliope by whistling shrilly through the gap in his teeth. With apparent carelessness he consulted the indicator board. There was no one waiting to descend. Stealthily he fumbled with the levers—swish!

The car dropped fifty feet like a dead weight before Tremaine could move a muscle. Gasping for breath, of which the swift descent deprived him, he pictured an awful death when the car should strike the bottom of the shaft. But the mad rush was checked as suddenly as it had begun, and the elevator finished its journey to the ground floor at a pace approved by all sensible and well regulated lifts.

A glimpse of Daniel O'Connell's grinning face in the mirror made all clear.

"You young rascal!" ejaculated the lawyer as he caught his breath. "You did that on purpose!"

"Well," retorted the boy, skipping nimbly out of reach, as he threw the door open, "you said youse was in a hurry!"

Ten minutes later the pedestrians on Sixty-fourth street were much edified to see a good looking young man stop suddenly, slap his thigh resoundingly and laugh aloud. Thereat a fat policeman hastily conned over in a somewhat fat mind the list of those "wanted" at headquarters that day. A newsboy on the wing paused long enough to shout "Bugs!" before he swooped on again, to all of which Tremaine, joyously absorbed in a great, a stupendous idea, paid not the slightest attention.

His high spirits were mysteriously communicative. That evening Daniel O'Connell, in an endeavor to outdo previous calliope performances, almost blew a tooth out. His small chest was puffed like a pouter pigeon as he laid a crisp five dollar note in the lap of his mother.

* * * * * * *

The wintry afternoon was closing as Miss Ten Eyke, in a house gown which to the masculine eye made her beauty simply bewildering, called the elevator to the fourteenth floor of the Alameda. She had spent the afternoon with a girl friend, and as the car stopped her heart beat a little more rapidly over a certain possibility—that she might encounter Tremaine—for Miss Marjorie was very much in love with the young lawyer, despite their quarrel.

She invariably explained to herself at this annoying quickening of the pulses that it was fear, not hope, which made her feel so. Daniel O'Connell approved of Miss Marjorie. She had nice eyes and a friendly way of looking at "a feller." Sometimes they talked—about elevators and books and a guy not having any chance to go to school and how it was a good thing to study nights.

He was a stanch little partisan, too, and talked of his friends of the other sex, chief of whom was Mr. Tremaine. And, although when the conversation turned on the lawyer it usually became a monologue, Miss Marjorie was a good listener. Her eyes would grow soft, and she would sigh a little. One day when Daniel O'Connell gleefully told of a case which Tremaine had just won she gave him a quarter.

"Down!" said a masculine voice, and Miss Ten Eyke's fear—or hope—was realized. The car stopped at the twelfth floor for Mr. Tremaine. He removed his hat with that air of impersonal courtesy which is so annoying when a person is willing to accept an overture of peace. Of course she had returned his ring and sent back his notes unopened and refused to speak to him, but that was two whole months ago. Why couldn't he have been more persistent? Didn't he know a girl could change her mind? Oh, dear! The tenth floor, and he wasn't going to even look—

Swish! The car seemed to drop from beneath their feet. They were falling! An agonized vision flashed into Marjorie's mind, a vision of herself lying crushed and broken at the bottom of the shaft. With a cry which struck remorse to the hearts of the plotters, she turned to Tremaine, hands outstretched.

"Morgan, dear, save me!" And when Tremaine had gathered her protectingly into his arms Daniel O'Connell neatly caught the cable again.

* * * * * * *

Mrs. Ten Eyke was spending the evening in Brooklyn, and by the glowing grate Marjorie and Tremaine planned the wedding down to the last bridesmaid.

"I'd like to have Daniel Moloney there, too, dear," said the young man. "He's a—a sort of accomplice of mine—that is," hastily, "a pal. He's going to be my office boy after the 1st of the month."

"Daniel shall be there," replied Marjorie warmly as she nestled more closely to his shoulder. "I just love that boy! You don't know how much he thinks of you, Morgan. I'm so glad he's to be"—she hesitated a little and blushed charmingly over the pronoun—"our office boy. It would seem natural if he wasn't there."

Morgan winked at a particularly knowing coal in the grate. "Darling," he said impressively, "it wouldn't be a wedding without him."

Two and Three Letter Names of God.

There are thirteen known languages and dialects in which the name of the Deity is expressed in two letters—viz: Hebrew, Al; Simonian, El; Chinese, Fo; Hindoo-Syr, Ie; Babylonian, Il; Sanskrit, Ja; Egyptian, Ju; Tamil, Ko; Yocatanese, Ku; Hindoo, Om; Far East Hebrew, On; Egyptian, Ra; Chaldean, Ur.

The three lettered name is found in twenty-one languages and provincial dialects—viz:

East Indian, Aom; Hindoo, Aum; Chaldean, Bil; Slavonic, Bog (a contraction of "Biali-Bog," meaning white); Roman, Dea; Grecian, Deo; Essequibo, Dia; Hindoo, Div; Chaldean, Enu; English, God; Swedish and Danish, Gud; Persian, Hom; Hindoo, Hua; Phoenician-Babylonian, Iau; Sanskrit, Jah; Phoenician, Jao; Druidish-Irish, Joh; Egyptian, Kue; Irish-Celtic, Omh; Egyptian, Pan, and Latin, Sol.

Taken all together, there are 178 languages and dialects in which as a figure of speech God is expressed in words, but in none of them is the word of overgrown proportions, the longest being "Jaobulion," a word which expressed the Deity idea according to a certain sect of Irish Druids, known as "mistletoe eaters."

Her Recommendation.

A girl working as a servant told the housewife, "I'm going away, mom."

Said the woman indignantly: "Suppose some one writes me for a recommendation, what shall I tell them?"

Said the girl: "Tell them, mom, I stood it with you for a week. That recommend is good enough for me."

WEARY WILLY'S TALES

The Dilapidated Gentleman Continues Stories of Tramp Life.

HOW HE BECAME AN OUTCAST

While Staying at a Farmhouse He Tells a Fictitious Anecdote and Then Gets a Walloping From the Hired Man.

[Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.]

"Did it ever occur to you that Weary William meets up with coincidences as well as other folks?" asked the dilapidated gentleman as he pocketed the coin and prepared to talk. "Well, then, let me say that he does, and two that occurred to me a couple of years ago in my travels are worth relating. I had been hoofing it pretty hard for a couple of weeks when my feet got sore, and I looked for a place to lay off for a day or two. I selected a modest looking farmhouse and turned in, and my knock on the kitchen door was answered by a woman of about forty who weighed fully 200 pounds. She proved to be a widow with a daughter about ten years old and was running the farm with the help of a hired man.

"NEVER STOPPED FOR THE NEXT FIVE MILES."

"I offered to work for my board for two or three days and was set to picking up cider apples in the orchard. When supper time came, I had my meal alone and then helped the hired man do up the chores. The tramp who knows his business will always try to square the hired man on the farm, particularly if he has the bossing of things. This one didn't cotton to me worth a cent. He was gruff and surly, and, though I made it plain that I was not after his job, he wouldn't be friendly. As I afterward came to know, the widow had said a word or two in my praise, and that had cooked my mutton with him.

"After things had been cleared up for the night I sat down on the veranda steps, and presently the others came out. I was for moving away, but the widow detained me by saying that I must have had many adventures on the road and she would be glad to hear me talk. The hired man gave me a look of warning, but I passed it by and replied:

"'My story is one that I need not be ashamed of. I am on the road as a tramp simply because I was steadfast in my love for one of the most beautiful and lovable girls in all the world.'

"'You don't mean it!' exclaimed the widow as she threw her hands up. 'That's what I said to Jim an hour ago—that you didn't look like a common tramp.'

"'And I said he did, and he does,' growled the hired man.

"'I had just finished at Princeton college,' I said, 'when I attended a theater in the city and fell in love with the actress who played the part of the heroine in "Coon Hollow." I managed to secure an introduction to her that evening and told her of my love. She thought it was rather sudden, like falling off a house, but she did not discourage me. I followed the theatrical company around for a month, and then Gwendolin promised to be mine. When she spoke the words she made me the happiest man in all the world.'

"'Great snakes, but you don't tell me!' exclaimed the blushing widow. 'Why—why—I used to be on the stage myself!'

"'Is that so?'

"'I had the lead in the play you named.'

"'Can it be possible?'

"'And I—I—am Gwendolin, and you are—are'—

"'Arthur Bounicastle?'

"'Tableau!'

"'Red fire!'

"Hired man wanting to cut my throat then and there.

"When I had asked Gwendolin to be mine and she had consented," I resumed as soon as I could get a grip on myself, "I returned home to break the news of my happiness to my father. He met me with a cold and cruel stare, and in words in which there was no pity he informed me that I must give her up or become a penniless outcast. I took the alternative. With only 9 cents in my pocket I started to rejoin the woman who had my heart in her keeping. When I reached the town where I expected to find her it was to learn that she had eloped with the 'heavy' man of the company. That broke my heart and took all my courage away, and, instead of returning home to make peace with my father, I became a dilapidated gentleman, and here I am.

"'How strange! How wonderful! How queer!' exclaimed the widow as she hitched around. 'If any one had told me that this would have ever come to pass I should have called him crazy. It was all a terrible mistake, Arthur. The "heavy" man claimed to have seen a notice of your death in the papers, and as he was in love with me at the same time I decided to marry him. We did not elope, as was told you, but the company busted and we headed for New York over the railroad ties. A thousand times have I thought of you and always as sleeping in your grave. Yes, I am the willowy Gwendolin of a score of years ago. I am the leading lady of the play of "Coon Hollow."'

"Murmurs of astonishment from myself.

"Exclamations from the widow's daughter.

"Melting looks from the widow herself.

"Murderous glances from the hired man.

"I was telling a fictitious anecdote, of course. Nothing of the sort or kind had ever happened me, and to this day I believe the widow was also in the 'kidding' business. Perhaps she wanted to make the hired man jealous. At any rate, she said I must stay there for at least a month, and she pronounced my name in tender accents. The hired man got the green eye all right. It was announced that I was to have the parlor bedroom, but just before retiring he invited me to go to the barn with him to see the thrashing machine. He was it. When we got out there he called me all kinds of liars and thieves and gave me such a walloping that I took to the road and never stopped for the next five miles. How he explained matters to my willowy Gwendolin I never heard.

"The other coincidence I have in mind was pulled off in Connecticut. I was hoeing corn for a farmer for a dollar a day and my board, and had worked for three days, when he said we'd stop and rest our backs if I'd tell him a story. I agreed, and we dropped our hoes and sat down. The tramp who tells a farmer any story at all should make it a murder story to benefit by it. On this occasion I claimed to have murdered an old couple in Arkansas for their money, but was disappointed in laying hand on any cash. I described how I used ax, crowbar and knife and how I hid in a swamp for four days afterward, and he enjoyed the particulars like a boiled dinner. I put him on his oath not to give me away, and it seemed to me, after the story had been told, that he looked up to me with awe and reverence.

"Say, now, that was a curious thing. When we went to the house to supper the farmer showed me an old newspaper with an account of just such a crime in it. It had occurred in the same state, the victims were an old couple, and the murderer had made good his escape. I read it, but did not worry. After I had gone to bed the farmer drove six miles and got the sheriff and two constables, and these officers were within a quarter of a mile of the house when the good wife woke me up and warned me to flee. She said she always did have a sneaking sympathy for murderers, and she hoped I would get away.

"Get away I did, but I was followed for a hundred miles and had to do a heap of dodging. I don't know whether the farmer felt sure that I was the right party or not. You can't always tell about those Nutmeg farmers. He saved $3 by obliging me to take a skate, and I think that had a heap to do with his officiousness."

M. QUAD.

And Now the Auto Divorce.

"So Flyhigh and his wife are divorced? You surprise me! What was the ground?"

"Oh, incompatibility of ideas. She wanted to run their motor car with denatured alcohol, and he preferred gasoline. Of course they would never agree, so they have separated."—Judge.

Benefits of Education.

Mistress—Good gracious, Marie, what a mess your kitchen is in! Whatever have you been doing? It will take you a week to clean it, I should think.

Marie—Yes, mum; the young ladies have been down here showing me how to boil a potato according to the cookbook.

Mabel's Changing Moods.

When Mabel plays the typewriter,
The click portends her current mood;
It tells us how her thoughts prevail
And if she's feeling bad or good.
When peace is in her heart and brain,
The sound is soft as summer rain
That taps upon the window pane,
When Mabel plays the typewriter.

When Mabel pounds the typewriter,
A cloud arises in the sky,
The dove of peace outspreads its wings
To other regions quick to fly.
At tossing of her graceful head,
Bright with its crown of golden red,
You feel a growing sense of dread,
When Mabel pounds the typewriter.

When Mabel bangs the typewriter,
Look out—the cruel war's begun!
You hear the roll of musketry,
You hear the deadly gatling gun.
Don't say her yes, don't say her nay,
Don't dare a single word to say,
But softly, swiftly steal away
When Mabel whacks the typewriter.

Self Destruction Is Indefensible.

By General WILLIAM BOOTH, Head of the Salvation Army.

THE act of self destruction is a violation of the sacredness of life, the law of the land and an outrage upon the moral sense of the people. SUICIDE IS INDEFENSIBLE.

Yet it is on the increase in every land and among all classes. Modern civilization cannot claim it has fostered and developed the bonds that bind men to a JUST APPRECIATION of life. Statistics of suicides are alarming, especially in such countries as Denmark, Bavaria and several parts of the German empire. But no doubt many more perish by their own act whose names never appear in the statistical roll of suicides.

The offense is either committed in a way that baffles human skill in its effort to determine the cause of death or means are found by influential friends to hide away the crime.

BUT IF SO MANY WITH SUICIDAL INTENT FIND COURAGE FOR THE SAD DEED, WHO CAN CALCULATE THE NUMBER WHO WOULD CUT THE SACRED THREAD OF LIFE WHICH BINDS THEM TO THIS WORLD IF THEY ONLY DARED?

Nay, how many of the gay, laughing crowd around us have at one time or another CONTEMPLATED suicide, and how many this very day would hurry away from the present stage of being but for an indefinable dread of the future? I believe the number is larger than most people have the slightest conception of.

* * *

As to the causes that lead to suicide, they are numberless. No doubt "temporary insanity," the reason commonly assigned by the gentlemen who are so often called upon to inquire into the matter, is frequently the correct one. For who, not worked up to some terrible pitch of excitement TANTAMOUNT TO MENTAL DERANGEMENT, would commit so foolish a deed?

But how does that derangement come about? WHAT IS BEHIND IT?

The reasons commonly suggested are drink, speculation, dissipation, gambling and similar follies. These things lead, it is said, to all sorts of disappointments and vexations, under the influence of which weak, ill balanced, passionate and UNASSISTED minds give way, ending only too often in the deadly recourse to poison, the water, the revolver or the rope.

* * *

But farther back in the string of causes for this melancholy transaction I should say there too frequently lies A SENSE OF FAILURE in the struggle of life. Especially is this the case with those who have "come down in the world."

With many I believe the step is taken in the struggle to be good—in the vain effort to master some hated evil habit with the sense of UTTER FRIENDLESSNESS.

No one is at hand with sufficient sympathy or sense to UNDERSTAND them to whom the poor bleeding heart can be laid bare. So the fatal step is taken.

SUICIDE IN NINETY CASES OUT OF A HUNDRED MUST BE THE TRIUMPH OF DESPAIR.

The Abuses of Divorce Should Be Squarely Met.

By Rev. M. O. SIMONS of Cleveland, O.

THE foundation of society is the home, but TO BE A GOOD FOUNDATION it must be a GOOD home. A bad home, made bad by intolerable conditions which have become fixed and which have utterly destroyed the TRUE MARRIAGE, is no foundation for society. Its continuance may be a greater social evil than a divorce could ever be.

Women are coming to their own in America, and that is WHY divorces are more numerous among us. It is very significant that two-thirds of the divorces are granted to WOMEN. It has become possible at last for woman to throw off intolerable burdens which have crushed her in all the ages. And one thing that puts under suspicion much of the discussion about divorce is that it represents the traditional point of view of the MAN. The traditional and the ecclesiastical points of view are the man's point of view and do not represent the HIGHER APPRECIATION OF WOMAN or of her position in the marriage relationship.

Divorce is regarded as a disease, when, as a matter of fact, it is only a SYMPTOM of a disease, which disease is wrong ideas of married life, of home life. Treated as a symptom and safeguarded, the institution of the home may be benefited and not hurt by it. To assume that it cannot be SAFEGUARDED is unwarranted. In some cases it is a wrong and a scandal. An abuse of divorce would injure society. But to expect divorce to show no abuses would be as unreasonable as to expect democracy to show no abuses. To prohibit divorce BECAUSE OF ABUSES would be as unreasonable as to revert to monarchy because of the abuses of democracy.

PEOPLE SHOULD MAKE SOME VENTURE OF FAITH IN DEALING WITH DIVORCE AS THEY DO IN DEALING WITH DEMOCRACY AND BELIEVE THAT ABUSES CAN BE SO MET AND MASTERED THAT THE DANGER IN EXTREME LICENSE IN DIVORCE CAN BE PREVENTED.

Perplexing Associations.

By BARRY PAIN.

THE frequent association of things between which there is no OBVIOUS connection is always rather perplexing. Why do vegetarians generally believe in votes for women? Why are GOOD chess players generally fond of coffee? Why are antivivisectionists as a rule not quite trustworthy? Why have artists generally got pleasant voices? Why are HUMOROUS writers mostly MELANCHOLY people?

I SUPPOSE THERE IS AN EXPLANATION IF ONE COULD BOTHER LONG ENOUGH TO THINK IT OUT.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

There are but a few more weeks of school; accordingly, this column will soon be discontinued. If you have an article intended for publication, now is the time to get it in. The contest will close within the next two weeks.

The following article has been received for publication in the series:

COOPERATION.

I wish to divide this subject into three divisions: First, the teacher from a teacher's standpoint; second, the teacher from an outside view; third, the necessity of cooperation.

It is an adage that in union there is strength. History records many great undertakings made possible by cooperation. The confederation of the New England colonies protected them from the scalping knife of the red men of that community. The uniting of the labor organizations has been one of the greatest agencies in fighting aggressive capital that this country has ever produced. Furthermore, cooperation of the state and the citizens with the colleges of our land have made them the institutions which they are to day If this is true of such undertakings which are so large, how much more should it be true of the common school, a subject in which all should be interested.

The writer believes that the patrons of the schools are not thoroughly acquainted with the teacher's work and the great responsibility resting upon her. Hence, let us look at the teacher from a teacher's standpoint, in all sincerity and fairness, and note some of the trials that confront her. Let us follow a teacher as she enters the school room and begins her work with from thirty to fifty pupils of all grades and of various dispositions. She must be governor, policeman, judge and teacher all at the same time. She hears from twenty-five to thirty-five recitations daily; she hears each pupil recite from four to ten times a day, or about two hundred separate recitations.

One of the teacher's greatest troubles is to have the students in regular attendance. It is just as bad for a student to attend irregularly as it would be for the teacher to be absent several times a week. It is impossible to do good work with irregular students. They will leave the school in the spring knowing no more than when they entered; then they say that the teacher is "no good."

This is but one of the many evils with which the rural teacher has to contend. He is also charged with being lazy, for it is said that no industrious person would teach school. Furthermore, he is branded as a "county robber."

Then there is a class who are opposed to the teacher because he he cannot answer every question that is brought to him; they forget the adage that a fool can answer a question that a wise man cannot answer. Often the teacher is condemned because he does not have better order in his school; these same critics forget that the teacher can not teach a child to behave who is permitted to act like a wild beast while in his own home; his own parents cannot keep him out of mischief. What would these same parents do if they had forty such mischief-makers? However one of the greatest hindrances I find to maintaining order in my school is because the children are taught at home not to obey the teacher.

Patrons are you aware of the fact that the future government of this country will some day be managed by those who are in the school room today? The children now in our care will some day steer the ship of state. As they grow to manhood and to womanhood, they will take their places in the various fields. It may be the political, religious, or educational world; it matters not. From their ranks will come the statesmens, ministers, teachers, business men, and women in all walks of life. Will they be God fearing, conscientious men and women, adding glory and honor to their country, state, nation and race? Or will they be worthless characters, lawless and unworthy citizens, anarchists, enemies of public good; bring shame, not glory, terror, not peace, brooding vice, not virtue? Which shall it be?

Trustees and patrons, it behooves you and me to assist these young people in our county schools lay a foundation for themselves that will provide them with the proper facilities upon which a proper life may be built; the young need to be guided and it is the duty of their elders to help them to direct their feet in the paths of duty and rectitude, so that they may be prepared for the battles which must take place later in their lives with the trying ordeals of this world.

We have good schools, but we need better ones, and to perfect them, we need the cooperation of the parents. Remember that the cornerstone of this land of the free and of the brave is the free public school system. As long as the schools remain and stay true to American principals, will freedom and liberty live; but when the schools go down, then goes down this Republic.

Governments will be just what the individual citizens are, especially in the democracy. And the citizen will hold to those things which have been instilled into them in the home and in the school. "As the twig is bent so the tree is inclined." How important it is then that the schools should be right.

And now, in conclusion let us all work with a true and honest zeal, putting our shoulders unitedly to the wheel, for the advancement and uplifting of our schools which are the bulwarks of a free country; and thereby leave something for the coming generations that will mould their character to stand and be remembered long after we have passed away. Iron will rust, wood will rot, marble and granite wear away; character alone will stand the test and live through countless ages. Man dies, but his memory lives; "Fame is a vapor, popularity an accident, riches take wings; those who cheer today will curse tomorrow; only one thing endures—character."

"Let us then be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor and to wait."

FOR SALE
OR
FOR RENT
For Summer 1907

At Deer Park, Maryland, Main Line B. & O. R. R., to St. Louis, 2,500 Feet Above Tidewate, a Country Place of About 180 Acres.

"GLAMORGAN."

Thoroughly equipped as a farm and bounded by three county roads, insuring convenience and privacy. It is well adapted to public use, such as a Sanatorium or to private residences, five sites with beautiful views and appurtenant acres, being reached by its three miles of private pleasure drives through the woods.

The dwelling house was built from plans by Hewitt Bros., of Philadelphia. The plumbing is by Ogelsby, of the same city. It is in complete order, and is rep[illegible] with the modern appliances of a gent[illegible]an's residence. It is within ten minutes' walk of the post-office and railroad station and within one mile of the Deer Park Hotel. Its general plan is as follows:

Wide porches surround three faces terminated, on a level, with billiard room.

I. FIRST FLOOR.—Parlor, hall with main stair case, library, dining room and lavatory.

II. BACK BUILDING.—Stair case to cellar, in which are furnace, gas machine (supplied by outside gasometer), wine closet, pantry (hot and cold water), back stairs to second story back building. Laundry—3 stationary tubs, hot and cold water in each; ironing stove, fire hose on reel and special boiler. Kitchen, with range, sink and all appliances. Back porch, ten feet from which is ice h[illegible]use practically inexhaustable in summer; servant's bath room, etc.

I. SECOND FLOOR.—Two communicating chambers, with bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; total, four chambers with three bath rooms.

II. BACK BUILDING 2nd FLOOR. Four chambers, two closets, bath room with W. C. adjoining.

THIRD FLOOR.—Two chambers, two large lofts.

Every room has gas fixtures and eight rooms have open fire-places in addition to furnace register.

The water supply is unexceptionable, its every source being from springs rising within the confines of the place and all having passed analytical examination. Two tanks (each in contact with outside air) having a combined capacity of 14,500 gallons, a wind mill, a horse power and an overshot wheel supplying the motor. Three dams (likewise spring water) contribute the ice supply and two of them are stocked with fish. The outbuildings are a barn with stalls for six horses and eight carriages, with ample storage for hay, straw and oats and having a coachman's room, a tenant's house of five rooms, a large cow and sheep stable and numerous sheds, etc.

This property is without encumbrance and possession can be given in May, 1907.

Apply to Owner, 1632 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

HE GOT ONE LAUGH.

I wrote a verse once on a time,
The cutest thing, methought, in rhyme
That I had ever dickered at—
A verse compact of fun and wit,
A Calverley might hap have writ,
A Carroll would have snickered at.

I read it through with pleased guffaws
And gave myself the due applause
To brain that had indited it.
All day I said it o'er and o'er,
And I would laugh and shout and roar
And scream as I recited it.

So I, to give my friends a treat,
Invited all of them to meet
And howl at me perusing it.
I said, "My friends, I've scribbled here
The loudest laugh in many a year
And would not have you losing it."

Then I, with nothing more ado,
Began to read that ditty through.
My eager eyes a-glittering.
But—could you dream it?—no glad cheers,
No peals of laughter, smote my ears,
No irrepressible tittering!

My face went white; my soul was tossed;
'Twas mighty plain I'd got a frost,
As sure as Sunday morning.
For not one soul but me seemed glad,
And some looked blue, and some looked mad,
And not a few were yawning.

I ended, and they said, "It's bum!"
I stood there feeling mighty glum
And cussed my gay experiment,
And then it chanced my right eye bent
Upon my lines, and off I went Into a fit of merriment.

—Richmond Times-Dispatch.

Sweet Naivete.

Among the interested visitors of the marine barracks at Washington on one occasion was a party of young girls from a Maryland town, friends of one of the officers of the barracks. They proved very much interested in everything pertaining to the life and discipline of the post.

"What do you mean by 'taps?'" asked one young woman.

"Taps are played every night on the bugle," answered the officer. "It means 'lights out.' They play it over the bodies of dead soldiers."

A puzzled look came to the face of the questioner. Then she asked:

"What do you do if you haven't a dead soldier?"—Philadelphia Ledger.

Confusing.

Outlate (returning to his hotel at 2 a. m. and mistaking his room)—Good gracious, I must be in bed already! Here are my feet.—Pele Mele.

Couldn't Believe Him.

After a wordy argument in which neither scored two Irishmen decided to fight it out. It was agreed that immediately either said, "I've had enough," the fight should cease.

After they had been at it about ten minutes one of them fell and at once exclaimed:

"Enough! I've had enough!"

But his opponent kept on hitting him until a man who was watching them said:

"Why don't you let him get up? He says he's had enough."

"I know he said so," said the victor, without relaxing his efforts, "but he's such a liar you can't believe a word he says."—Glasgow Herald.

As Its Papa Eats.

"Oh, yes, Nuritch's baby was born with a silver spoon in its mouth, of course."

"It's a curious looking child. Takes after its father, doesn't it?"

"No, indeed. If it took after its father it would have been born with a silver knife in its mouth."—Catholic Standard and Times.

He Might Do.

Dr. Story, the late principal of Glasgow university, taking a holiday in the country once, was met by the minister of the district, who remarked: "Hello, principal! You here? Why, you must come down and relieve me for a day." The principal replied, "I don't promise to relieve you, but I might relieve your congregation."

None For Her.

Miss Ann Teek—Really, some of the young girls nowadays are positively awful! The idea of a girl being engaged to two young men at the same time! It's just shameful!

Miss Cutting—Besides, you find it aggravating also, don't you?—Philadelphia Press.

Some Compensations.

Benevolent Lady (going over asylum, to a lunatic)—Poor man! What a sad existence for you—always being cooped up in this place!

Lunatic—Not at all, madam. The fools who come to see us are sometimes quite amusing.—Bon Vivant.

His Theory.

"You deny that there is any such thing as hard times?"

"Certainly," answered Mr. Dustin Stax. "Prosperity is always with us. The only difficulty is that it sometimes becomes rather concentrated and circumscribed."

A Living In the Soil.

"There's a man who gets his living out of the soil, even though he does work in the city all the year round."

"Nonsense! How can he do that?"

"He's the owner of a laundry."

GRAFT IN ENGLAND.

Perhaps Not So Great In Extent as Here, but Yet Well Started.

The Operation of Public Utilities by Public Officials Has Placed Them Under Such Temptations as They Have Never Before Known—Why They Are Not Exposed.

There is nothing about the visiting American in England more amusing to the native than the American's conviction that there is no graft in English municipal politics.

Frederick C. Howe, the magazinist who writes so much in praise of municipal ownership, the British form of socialism, admits that there is graft in England, but says it is all practiced by the lords and millionaires. No graft, he declares, has crept in through the municipal ownership and operation of public utilities.

"Graft in England may not be of such magnitude as in the United States," said an Englishman who is well known in public life, but is neither a lord nor a millionaire, "but it exists here as certainly as it does in America. It is carried on along similar lines, and, fostered by the opportunities which the rising tide of municipal trading affords, it is rapidly growing in magnitude. It is owing to our overstrict libel laws and to the fact that immunity may not be granted under English law to one who confesses to accepting a bribe that the corruption now so well known to exist in our municipal governments has not been effectively exposed long ago.

"The newspapers know all about it, and they know who are the grafters, but they do not dare to expose the situation, and until the proper statutes are enacted it will be almost impossible to punish grafters through the courts.

"Not so very long ago a certain speech was reported in one of the London newspapers. The speechmaker was indignant, for neither the subject matter of the speech nor the circumstances under which it was delivered were creditable to him, and he brought a suit for damages on the ground that the libel laws had been violated. It was not claimed that the speech was incorrectly reported; indeed, it was admitted that the report was substantially without error, yet nevertheless heavy damages were awarded to the plaintiff on the grounds that the plaintiff's reputation had been injured and that the publisher could not show that the publication of the report was of benefit to the public.

"A little longer ago it was suspected that members of the council of London borough of Poplar had been accepting bribes from contractors who were furnishing materials and supplies. Detectives were put upon the case, and the facts were run down. Certain of the contractors and councilmen, confronted with these facts, confessed and promised to go upon the stand in court and testify to the truth. In due time one of the guilty men took the stand as promised and told the story as agreed.

"He was immediately arrested as a criminal under the law as its stands and slated for an early trial. This chilled the enthusiasm of the others who had promised to confess, and they changed their minds promptly and irrevocably. As the prosecution was thus left without witnesses, the investigation was brought to an abrupt close.

"Now, the installation and operation of tramways, electric light works, gas works, etc., involves the letting of many large contracts by men who hold places in the municipal councils, not because they are fitted by training and experience to let such contracts, but because they have succeeded through petty politics in getting elected. They receive no pay for their services and in many cases are men without financial resources of any consequence.

"There are contractors in England as well as in America who are not above getting contracts through bribery, and there are council members of the grade I have mentioned who are no more able to resist the temptation to be bribed in England than they would be in America. If it would not sound unpatriotic, I might go so far as to say that since municipal trading has so increased the magnitude of municipal contracts Englishmen in many cities have been known to seek election to the councils in order to have the chance to be bribed.

"We could today make exposures of graft in London and more than one other English city that would startle American readers even, accustomed as they are to reading graft stories, if we could only give immunity to whoever might be either scared or reasoned into confessing the truth. In other words, municipal ownership and operation of public utilities in England are rapidly honeycombing all our municipal governments with graft.

"The law makes an exception with regard to election bribery [illegible] and immunity [illegible] granted to those whose [illegible] needed to convict the [illegible] ed us to [illegible] larities, as the [illegible] newspapers know [illegible] we are going [illegible] facts with [illegible] bery in Eng[illegible] tion. We [illegible] that it wi[illegible] cult to [illegible] ago in Am[illegible] perpetrated [illegible] Tweed ring."

Nothing [illegible] that thoroughly takes [illegible] stimulus of profit in carrying on any business establishment.—Exchange.

ETITON FOR RECEIVER HAS BEEN DISMISSED.

The Penn—Garrett Coal Company Has Paid All Outstanding Indebtedness.

The application for a receiver for the Penn—Garrett Coal Company of Garrett county, which was filed in the Circuit 'ourt in this county a few weeks ago, s been dismissed by Mr. Gilmor S. nill, attorney for the creditors, who tioned the Court for the appoint- t of a receiver, alleging in the bill the company was insolvent and le to pay its liabilities.

e bill stated that large amounts due from the coal company for performed and materials furnish- or the erection of buildings, etc., egating about $12,000.

e company recently spent over $60,- the installation of the plant. It talized at $100,000 and the mort- nd issue is for the same amount. ently it began operations and while all expense at the start, the company had ample capital to meet all obligations and the president, Mr. C. L. Pullen, of New York, was surprised over the local flurry, which, however, was soon dissiapated. All bills have been paid and the company has ample working capital to continue operations ndefinitely, which will be done,

All demands of labor have been met and the bills against the company were largely for supplies and in a number of cases payment was withheld until proper authentication was produced.

The company had been perfectly solvent all the time and the confident tone f the answer to the application for a eceiver, filed by De Warren H. Reyn- , Esq., attorney, showed that at no me was it in fear of dissolution by a eivership.

Pullen and Attorney Reyn- at Oakland Saturday, and he dismissal of the applica- ne receivership, meeting all ns. President Pullen went to endsville Monday to look after the mption of work. All men will re- rt for work and shipments will begin in ten days. The company owns over 9,000 acres and promises to be one of the foremost industries of Garrett dounty.

The company has a contract today with one of the largest coal companies Philidelphia to furnish it with 200,000 ns of coal by April 1, 1908. The coal been tried and tested and found en- ly satisactory. Since the mining operation has begun a ready market has been found for it.

OAKLAND FLOODED.

High Waters Causes Some Damage and Much Inconvenience.

The storm which broke over this section of the country Tuesday night and continued all day Wednesday, has resulted in bringing the waters up to such a stage that all creek and river bottoms are entirely submerged, resulting in damage to the county roads and bridges, fencing and in some cases washing fields very badly.

In Oakland the cellars in the business sections of town have become flooded putting out furnace fires and making things generally inconvenient.

The electric light plant was also flooded to such an extent that the engineers were unable to reach the fire room and in consequence the town was in totsl darkness last night so far as electric lights were concerned. This morning the water had fallen but eight inches, leaving eighteen inches of water yet in the plant. The probabilities are that the plant will not be operated again tonight.

Baptist Services at Deer Park.

Baptist services were held at Deer Park on Sunday morning, Rev. C. W. Hudson, officiating. Mr. Hudson announced that beginning on Sunday, March 24th, he would begin a series of sermons. The subjects would be, "Is Immersion the only Form of Baptism?" the second on "Sprinkling," the third on "Who Should be Baptised." and the fourth on "The Relation of Baptism to the Lord's Supper."

Mr. Hudson assured his congregation that he would not say anything in these discourses not authorized by the scriptures, that he would not assails any other denomination, and he extended an invitation to all to attend and bring bibles. He said he would even be willing to submit to and answer questions. At any rate he extended a warm invitation for all to come and study the question with him in the same spirit in which he expected to preach, that of love and edification.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered on Sunday morning, and one young lady was received into the church for baptism.

New Special Delivery Law.

One of the last acts of Congress was to pass a bill providing that stamps to the value of ten cents when attached to a letter or package in excess of the regular postage take the place of the special delivery stamp. After July 1 all the bother rushing around to drug stores, branch postoffices and other places in search of a special delivery stamp will not have to be done. When the writer of a letter wants it "special delivery" all that must be done is to attach six two cents stamps to it, one for the postage and the other to make up the ten-cent charge for "special delivery."

GARRETT COUNTY FARMERS' INSTITUTE MEETINGS

Interesting Sessions Held In Three Towns of the County.

The institute meetings held in our county, during the past week, are reported as having been largely attended, and to have awakened more interest than any heretofore held. There were large turnouts at both Grantsville and Accident. The attendance at Accident exceeding that of any single meeting in the State this far, notwithstanding the unfavorable weather. The Oakland meetings were held in the opera house, and all the sessions were well attended. Mr. Wm. L. Amos, we regret to say, was unable to be present in our county on account of sickness.

A new feature was the introduction of the corn judging contest, through which the boy bringing the best ten ears of corn, selected by himself, received a certificate entitling him to two weeks' free tuition at the Maryland Agricultural College This contest was won by Peter F. Gortner, son of Mr. Fred. Gortner, of Sunnyside.

Mr. Campbell spoke upon the cultivation of the potato, giving some valuable suggestions. He also treated the poultry question. From his experience he advocated the small movable poultry house, say 6x8 feet, upon a skid or runner, these houses to be of rough boards, and made air tight except in front by covering them with paper and a coat of tar. The front to be enclosed by wire, and a window covered with cotten, hinged at the top to be used only when necessary to protect the birds from rain or snow. From careful experiments carried on for a year, by the Cornell Experiment Station, he showed that it had been found that pure bred hens of laying strains, would far excell the barn yard fowl. He also proved from tables made as the result of the above experiments, that a well balanced ration of protine and carbonate, was an essential for the successful production of eggs.

Mr. Watts gave a very instructive lecture upon, "The Soil as a Reservoir," showing how important water is as a conveyor of plant food, for the soil may be full of phoshates and mineral salts, but if there is not sufficient moisture in the soil to dissolve them, and convey them to the roots of the plants, their usefulness is lost. To hold the necessary moisture our fields must be thoroughly cultivated, and the soil made "fine and porous" so that as a sponge it may absorb and retain moisture. As moisture is lost to the soil by capilary attraction, it is necessary to cultivate frequently, especially in dry weather, so as to break up this action, and prevent evaporation. Mr. Watts also urged all farmers to look out for their farm equipment, illustrating the advantages to be derived from up-to-date machinery, good teams, and thorough system. The saving of all manure, both solid and liquid, and the daily or frequent removal of into the fields, was shown to be the best economy.

Senator W. McCulloh Brown spoke upon "The Apple Interest in Garrett." He first showed the profit which might be expected from good fruit during the winter and spring months, having with him samples of apples bought in the Baltimore market, which ranged in price from $2.60 to $4 for the highest quality. These same were being in no way superior to many of those exhibited from Garrett county at the late exhibit in Baltimore, where the fact of our carrying off so many prizes, proved their quality without peradventure. Mr. Brown said that the reason that our farmers bad not awakened to the great possibilities in apple culture, was that we all have orchards, and that in them there are so many different kinds, that we are not able to create a market outside the county owing to our small shipments. Again a large portion of our apples are of the summer and early varieties, when not finding a market for these, the farmer is discouraged and does not see the profit that could be made if he would turn to winter fruit, and then seek a different market. Garrett county is an ideal locality for apples. What is needed is that we raise MORE APPLES of a KIND, and THAT THESE BE ALL WINTER and LATE KEEPING VARIETIES. In future plant only these. To hasten the desired result, GRAFT THE GREATER PART OF ALL YOUR SUMMER APPLE TREES at once WITH WINTER FRUIT. When you can ship a car load of apples (about 500 bushels) of a kind, and this quantity should be raised upon one acre of good trees; then you will reap the profit which should be yours.

DEMOCRATS SUCCESSFUL IN THE CITY ELECTION.

Their Entire Councilmanic Ticket Won by Safe Majorities.

The election held on Monday for three members of the Town Council of Oakland, was a spirited one from the time the polls opened at eight o'clock in the morning until their close at six o'clock in the afternoon, members of both the political parties working strenuously for the success of their favorites.

The result was a great surprise to the Republicans; to the Democrats it was as through the millenium had come, for so seldom does that party win a victory in these latter days that they were intoxicated with joy as soon as the result was announced and some of them with something else as soon as that which is necessary to produce that "joyful feeling" could be obtained.

It was a "g-rr-eat victory," as Mr. Dooley says, and they are not through crowing yet. They assemble on the street corners even at this late day and discuss with all the enthusiasm at their command the overwhelming defeat of their opponents!

Yes, it was a splendid victory, from a Democratic standpoint!

Some who have been itching for office will be placated!

One will become City Clerk at the munificent salary of $25 per—week? No, per year!

Another will become Treasurer, and still another will be Tax Collector, both paying salaries as large as that of the City Clerk. The slate has been made up, but it may be broken. The City Attorney will be another plum for which there will be many applicants, several having already filed their claims as a reward for the great service they rendered in helping win the victory. But they will wake up! The Attorneyship is the Mayor's personal appointment, which fact has evidently escaped the eagle eye of the great local barristers who have applied to members-elect of Council for the job.

But to return to the result of the election.

The Democrats named their candidates at a meeting held on Thursday night at the Council Chamber when they placed Messrs. Harry Helbig, James H. Painter and William G. Hinebaugh in the field against the Republican ticket named on Wednesday night which was composed of Messrs. E. A. Weimer, Samuel Sawton and Edward W. Helbig.

At the election one hundred and seventy votes were cast with this result—

Democrats—Harry Helbig, 143; James H. Painter, 142; William G. Hinebaugh, 146.

Republicans—E. A. Weimer, 106; Samuel Lawton, 130; Edward W. Helbig, 134.

Verily, it was g-rr-eat!

Opportunity for the Charitable.

Simon Caton, farmer, living not far west of Frostburg, aged 31 years, died Friday, March 1st, last, of "black diphtheria." Three weeks before an infant son died. Last summer his barn burned, inflicting a loss of farm implements and 2 fine horses, about the same time his father died. All of these misfortunes have reduced the widow of Simon Caton to want. She lives in a thinly settled section of people, themselves unable to extend much aid. She charitably-inclined institutions and people of Frostburg should unite in extending assistance in an instance where it is needed and deserved—and do so quickly.—Frostburg Mining Journal.

THE DEATH RECORD.

HERMAN FOGLE.

Herman Fogle died very suddenly at the home of his brother-in-law, Jacob Bender, in Grantsville, Md., last Wednesday morning. His ailment was inflammation of the spine. Deceased was a son of Mr. and Mrs. Adam Fogle of Elk Lick, and was well known where he resided all his life, with the exception of the past year or two, which he spent in Grantsville. He was a single man, but is survived by his parents, four brothers and three sisters.

Valuable Property at Public Auction.

Mr. Daniel Annan, of Cumberland, who has been appointed trustee by the Circuit Court for the purpose of selling the real estate of the late Magruder Perry, advertises in this paper today the sale of the property, which will take place in front of the court house in Oakland on Friday, April 5th. 1907. The land to be offered for sale is said to be covered with the finest body of timber in this section of the country and will probably bring a good price.

YOUNG MAN LOSES LEG.

William Tasker, Aged 20 Years, Maimed by B. & O. Train.

Last Monday night William Tasker, aged 20 years, son of Mr. Richard Tasker, of Swanton, was brought to Oakland suffering with serious injuries which he sustained when alighting from a freight train near his home that evening.

At the office of Dr. McComas, where the man was taken from the station, it was found that besides many cuts and bruises, young Tasker's left leg had been run over by the cars and amputation of the limb was necessary, the operation being performed immediately.

The next morning he was taken to the County Jail and placed in the hospital ward where he is being treated.

Celebrated Their Silver Wedding.

The Los Angeles (Cal.) Times of the 1st inst. contained the following society note which will be of more than passing interest to many Garrett countians who remember Dr. and Mrs. A. F. Speicher, both natives of this county, who removed to the west a number of years ago. In connection with the Times' article there was also printed half-tones of Dr. and Mrs. Speicher, true to life as we remember them. The excerpt from the Times follows:

"A brilliant reception was given last evening at the home of Dr. and Mrs. A. F. Speicher of No. 3005 Vermont avenue, in honor of their silver wedding anniversaary, and over one hundred guests were present to extend congratulations to this worthy couple. The house was simply decorated in cut flowers and greenery. Clusters of sweet peas were prominent decorative features of the parlor, and yellow jonquils graced the library, while the receiving-room was fragrant with white carnations. The guests of honor stood in front of a background of shining smilax, which occupied one corner of the reception-room. They were assisted in receiving by Mrs. Speicher's brother, Dr. E. H. McMillan, and his bride of Santa Monica. Mrs. McMillan, who was formerly Miss Marie Madison of Pasadena, is a holiday bride, and wore her bridal gown, a creation of white crepe de chine over taffeta. Mrs. Speicher was attired in black voile over black taffeta, trimmed in lace. Schillinger's Orchestra discoursed sweet music. In the few years that they have lived in Los Angeles, Dr. and Mrs. Speicher have made a host of friends. They are prominent workers in the University Methodist Church."

Free Seeds Exhausted.

The demand for free seeds sent us by the Agricultural Department at Washington for distribution among our patrons, has been so great that they have become exhausted and we are unable to fill a number of orders by mail and otherwise requesting packages of the seeds.

FREIGHT WRECKED AT STATION SUNDAY MORNING

Eight Cars Derailed. Three of Them Going Over the Embankment.

Sunday morning at about half past eleven o'clock a freight wreck of considerable proportions took place just a few yards west of the station in Oakland, resulting in the derailment of eight cars, three of them being thrown over the embankment toward the Little Youghiogheny River.

The wreck was caused by a flange on the rear truck of a steel car loaded with coal, breaking off, which threw the car from the rails, tearing out a switch and seven cars following it.

The three cars thrown over the bank were loaded, one with hay and two with terra cotta pipe.

To clear up the wreck required the services of the steam crane from Keyser, which arrived an hour or two after the smash-up, but it was not until Tuesday afternoon that the damaged cars were righted and taken to the shops for repairs.

BITTINGER.

Scarcity of news and abundance of snow is the condition here.

The snow storm last Sunday prevented Rev. Mr. Shoup from holding services at this place as had been announced.

Rev. J. B. Shoup was called to the bedside of Mrs. Sweitzer, an aged lady residing near Swanton, who is very ill.

W. A. Althers is reoiling the interior of the Lutheran church and parsonage at this place this week.

E. S. Brenneman spent last Sunday with his brother Mahlon at McHenry.

Mahlon Warnick, of Jennings, was an agreeable caller at the home of T. B. Wiley, last Sunday.

Howard Shoup captured and killed a large ground hog last week and now perhaps since his hogship's day is over we may expect better weather.

Simon Brenneman drove to Springs, Pa., last Monday and brought home a load of tiling.

What was it that Mary did?
Mary didn't know;
But Mary "totes" a broken heart
Since Effie "swiped" her beau.

No Trains Since Yesterday.

On account of unusually high waters in the Ohio River valley no passenger trains have passed through Oakland for the east since yesterday afternoon at five o'clock, except a local train made up in Grafton last night. All other trains have been abandoned.

The International Sunday School Lesson.

First Quarter. Lesson XI. Genesis xxv, 15-23,41-45. March 17, 1907.

Copyright, Davis W. Clark.

Jacob and Esau.

After twenty years, and in answer to prayer, twin sons were born to Isaac and Rebekah. They are perfect contrasts in appearance, disposition, and occupation. There was certainly a preface to the crucial scene before us. It was not wholly fortuitous. The way to it was paved. Esau's contempt for his right of primogeniture was the gradual out growth of his recklessness, impiety, and misalliances. The priestly office and personal piety incumbent upon the inheritor of that vast estate so discounted it in Esau's eyes that he did not care a rush for it; he believed he could get a fortune by some other means, and one not incumbered by such distasteful conditions.

On the other hand, Jacob plainly saw his brother's utter unfitness for the primogenitureship; how a great patrimony was in imminent danger of being dissipated. The prophecy of his birth, too, was often whispered in his ear by a partial mother. He was over hasty, and thought he must needs use human expedients to help God carry out his plan. The hand of Jacob, the heel-holder, had often been stretched out before to trip his brother

A half-dozen verses suffice for one of the finest protraitures of opposite characters to be found in literature. Jacob is at his tent door, seething lentils into a savory, pungent, nourishing porridge of a red color. Esau, coming from the field, fatigued and too impatient to wait until the game he may have taken could be prepared for him, cried: "Let the red (one) gobble up that red!" It is the will of a wayward man. Jacob steps between the kettle and the hunter. He makes the most of his opportunity. "Ah, Esau, he has his hand upon your heel once more."

Esau's answer is pure Epicureanism. "Let me eat, drink, and be merry—to-morrow I die. The birthright! I don't care a fig for it any way." Crafty Jacob! he forestalls that saying, "A bad promise is better broken than kept by taking an oath for confirmation," which is an end of all things—to the Oriental. He is generous enough to throw in a little bread, which was not in the bargain. Esau eats, drinks, rises up, goes away.

The story of the stolen blessing is the sequel to the story of the stolen birthright. The father's final benedictions upon his first born took, in Oriental life, the nature of a sacrament. It was preceded by a sacred feast. The days of Isaac's dissolution were at hand. Preparations were making for the ceremony which should invest the eldest son with his sacred office. At this juncture Rebekah appears upon the scene in an unworthy and discreditable role. She practices a fraud upon her aged husband. She prompts one son to lie—and steals from another the highest office in the Oriental family. The picturesque narrative does not need the meritricious trappings of the stage. It is a living drama. The characters of which have a being before the eye. Aged and blind Isaac, wondering at his son's speedy return from the chase, his dull palate mistaking kid for venison, confused at a voice that sounds like Jacob's, but hands that feels like Esau's. Jacob first acting and then telling a lie. Rebekah lifting the tent curtain to witness the scene.

How quickly that scene shifts! Esau's discovery of the fraud, his vengeance vowed. Rebekah's warning to Jacob, Jacob's flight. The irretrievable sorrow of sin has fine and forceful illustration in the denouement. Esau, the profane despiser of his birthright—hear his wild cry, "Bless me, O my father!" And Rebekah, too, shall suffer her penalty. She shall never look into the face of her rover son again. And Jacob! He shall be a frightened fugitive in peril of his life for forty years. Deceits he practiced will be practiced on him, affecting the dearest relationship of life.

Analysis and Key.

1. Isaac's two sons in contrast.
   - Esau's contempt of primogeniture.
   - Despises priestly office involved.
   - Forgoes a fortune.
   - Jacob: recognizes brother's unfitness, uses human expedients to help God.
2. Sequel to story of stolen birthright.
   - The stolen blessing.
   - Sacramental benediction preceded by sacred feast.
3. Rebekah's unworthy role.
   - Deceives her husband.
   - Teaches one son to lie, steals from another.
4. The dramatic scene.
   - Persons and parts in the drama.
5. The denouement.
   - Esau's lament and vow of vengeance.
   - Jacob's forty-year exile.
   - Rebekah's virtual loss of both sons.

The Teacher's Lantern.

Great events turn on small hinges. A long-continued, bloody war was waged in the Middle Ages between two Italian cities, all about a stolen bucket. So in this instance, the destiny of the Hebrew race was within the narrow circumference of a bowl of soup.

* * * * *

How soon the pleasure of sin is over! Esau licked his lips, got up, and went away. The bubble may be very iridescent, but it bursts before you can wink your eye. How paltry the prizes of sin! Apples of Sodom! Ashes on the lips!

* * * * *

Sin lengthens out in sections, like a telescope. The overreaching of the brother seemed to necessitate the deception of the father. The deceitful pantomine before the dim vision of the patriarch had to break its silence in the audible lie, "I am Esau, thy first-born."

* * * * *

What irretrievable sorrow and suffering sin entails! Esau, the profane despiser of his birthright, hear his wild lament, his great and exceeding bitter cry: "Bless me, O my Father!" And Rebekah, too, shall suffer her penalty she shall never look into the face of her loved son again. Jacob shall be a frightened fugitive, in peril of his life—forty years an exile.

* * * * *

Strongest emphasis should be given to Esau's utter lack of appreciation of spiritual things. He was a profane person; one destitute of the religious sense. He was engrossed in the present, the material, the fleshy. He was carnallyminded. Unhappily he is not singular or exceptional in this. He is the very type of the man of the world who despises his title and inheritance as a child of God; in fact, sells it for a song. The last sentence clinches the lesson. "So Esau despised his birthright."

* * * * *

Despising one's birthright is not a folly peculiar to Patriarchial times. Failure to live up to one's highest ideals and opportunities is in every instance a present day despising of one's birthright. It can not be done without loss. The useless lament will follow.

* * * * *

The ethics of the family life were all outraged in this olden incident. But they are outraged in the story of human life that is waiting to-day. And in the larger family, the race, the individual and collections of individuals are deceiving and robbing each other. They think they thrive by doing so, and that this is the price of thriving. The social conscience needs quickening and instruction.

EXTRAVAGANT WASHINGTON LIFE

Some Reflections and Suggestions to Senator Albert J. Beveridge.

Senator Beveridge, Indiana's Grand Young Man, still nurses in his midriff that noble discontent which has always distinguished him from the common herd. For the moment he has turned his attention from child labor to the question of extravagant living in Washington. Too much money is wasted at the National Capital on clothing, food, luxury, and general indulgence and display. It goes to Mr. Beveridge's beating heart, it does, and quivers there to see such siuful waste. The statesman with the rolling mane begins to nurse despair. He stabs the future with a searching eye and discovers almost the exact date at which it will be impossible for any but a millionaire to sit in the Capitol and give the government a vigorous and well-fed service.

And this when the orators and lawmakers have just increased their own salaries by $2,500 a year!

As it happens however, we know something about Washington, even in this remote, parochial community, and our information leads us to the guess that the Indiana Jeremiah will be wise to mend his moan. Perhaps he has not thought of it, but there are more than 300 head of statesmen in that corral we call the Capitol, and a large majority of them are not millionaires or anywhere within sight of that condition. Moreover, it is still true that thousands of intelligent and cultivated men and women are more than willing to accept official positions yielding as little as $1,200 a year, while the $1,800 and $2,000 places are attacked in as large and determined numbers as were Guasimae, Caney, or San Juan in the strenuous and splendid year of 1898. Prices have "gone up" to some extent during the last few years, but Mr. Beveridge at least it bound to admit that his salary has gone up too. Automobiles are getting cheaper every year, and when it comes to theater and street cars, the least observant witness must confess that Washington is the very paradise of the chalked hat and the deadhead.

We make bold to wrestle with the Senator in this field. It seems to us that he has consorted too much with the wealthy and too little with those of straitened means. All of which enables us to imagine that he overrates the prevalence of the val-au-vent, the bruit imperial, the contract terrapin, and the caterer's entrees in general, forgetting the joyful sustenance of "jowl and greens," good honest hash, plain soup, and hot corn pone, with country butter and real pot of liquor on the side.

It is only natural that a man of Mr. Beveridge's official eminence, personal beauty, and captivating parlor manners should be sought, not to say solicited, by the gilded throng It is conceivable that he has forgotten the humble but invigorating and digestible fodder of his infancy. But Mr. Beveridge cannot make us believe that $7,500 a year is less than enough to keep the average statesman full of good cheer and leave him free at the close of the session to go back home with tightening waistband, curling upper lip, and very considerable salvage in his pocketbook.

We stand shoulder to shoulder with the Hon. Albert Jeremiah Beveridge in most things. We dote upon his shape, his forelock, and his gift of song. "Right here," however, we cut loose from his alluring tack, and take another path.—New York Sun.

GRASS SCARCER THAN PURE GOLD.

He Tried To Create a Lawn In Goldfield.

Byard Taylor wrote, half a century ago, that in the gold-town of Sonora he paid $11 a day for the board of himself and his mule—$4 for himself and $7 for the mule. Barley cost $1 a quart and grass $1 a handful. Probably all the other Sonara prices mentioned exceeded the present Goldfield quotations on grass have seldom or ever been beaten.

An Eastern man who went to the camp more that a year ago built a house on the "fashionable residential boulevard" known as Sundog avenue. It was quite a house. It had a cellar. Also one of those pioneer bathtubs came to it. And when the wind blew, as it usually does in Goldfield, not all of it got in.

When the tenderfoot's house was nearly done it occured to him that he would beautify its surroundings. There were no trees in Goldfield except in the Palm Restaurant in tubs; and the tenderfoot doubted that elms or maples like those that sheltered the New England house where he was born would grow successfully in Nevada. But he made up his mind that all events he would have a lawn. He sent for clover seeds—barrels of it—and for fertilizer—bags of it. Then he hired a man at $5 a day to build a lawn and make it grow.

Most of the Goldfield water comes from artesian wells, and all of it is alkaline, like the soil from which it is drawn. Moreover, it cost more than beer. But the hired man was diligent. He planted all the clover seed. He was prodigal with the water. People used to walk miles to see him throw it around. And he did not spare the fertilizer. But when the Nevada wind blows it piles up the alkali dust and when the sun of a Nevada summer shines is scorches like a prairie fire.

There were a good many symptoms of grass, and the heart of the tenderfoot was often cheered by them; but at the end of the summer his lawn consisted of just two healthy blades of grass, and they stood lonely, isolated, widely severed, in solitary grandeur.

Then the tenderfoot discharged his hired man, got out his receipted bills, took a pencil and paper and began to figure. At the end of fifteen minutes work he had calculated that those two blades of grass had cost him a trifle more than $1,000 or over $500 apiece.

"Anyhow," said he to sympathizing friends, "it is the only lawn in Goldfield."

But he didn't send for a lawnmower.

THE TIME FOR STUDY AND SLEEP

The Number of Hours By Which the Best Results Are Obtained.

Mothers know that the new born infant must sleep about 22 hours, and that this amount is so slowly lessened that the child still demands 12 hours when it is about 12 years old. It is quite likely that the normal amount is not reduced to 10 hours until about 18 years of age, or perhaps until 21 years. Nine hours may be required until well along in years.

To let boys of 14 sit up until 10 o'clock and then rout them out at 6 is nothing short of criminal, but it is a long-established custom. Lower animals can be quickly killed by depriving then of sleep—the boy is not killed, but perhaps he is so exhausted that he loses resistence to disease.

Medical students not infrequently make the same mistake, forgetting that a tired brain never absorbs anything. The midnight oil frequently represents wasted time and money, and the student sleeps during the next day's lectures when he should be wide awake.

A good test of exhaustion is the tendency to sleep during a dry lecture—and this is no joke.

Experience has proved that those who retire in time to sleep at least nine hours, and occasionally ten, get far more out of their course than the "grinds." Some of the best men habitually take ten hours. Theoretically a student should be as fresh at the end of the term as at the beginning—the vacation is for another purpose than sleep.

The whole subject though very old, is so new to the laymen who do the damage to schoolboys, particularly in boarding schools, that there is urgent need of wider publicity and much discussion for enlightenment. Not only will proper sleep permit more to be gained for less effort, but it will prevent the exhaustions which so frequently follow courses.

Physicians might teach mothers that it is harmful to waken children of any age—they should waken in the morning naturally. If they are not in time for school they do not retire early enough. If they are sleepy heads it is either the fault of the parents or the result of ocular defects.

There is much comment upon the large number of midshipmen who fail at the Naval Acadamy in a course no worse than in many colleges. It is suspected that they would do better if they had ten hours sleep daily.—American Medicine.

Stallions for Sale.

We have a pair of thoroughbred registered Percheron Stallions, aged four and five years respectively, which we will sell at an exceptionally low price to any Garrett county stockman. These horses are kind, gentle and thoroughly broken to both double and single harness and weigh 1800 pounds each. Will sell one or both animals. A special price to purchaser will be made upon guarantee that the horses will be kept in Garrett county for stock purposes at least two years from date of sale. These horses were bred and raised on Bond Bros. stock farm in Jefferson county, Pa., and belong to the famous Brilliant family which stands at the head of the Percheron stud. # AN EXPERIMENT.

How One In Optimism Caught Dallington Off His Guard.

Nothing stood in his way now and had the parlor to themselves.

"It's curious about optimism and pessimism, isn't it?"

"In what way?" she asked.

"Why, for instance, if a man is an optimist things seem to come his way whereas if he is pessimistic everything turns against him. That is to say, things we think are going to happen generally do happen."

"Oh, I don't believe in that theory. I've often thought things were going to happen when they didn't, and lots of other things have happened when I didn't believe they would."

"Yes, I know there are exceptions to the rule; but, generally speaking, I think optimism brings the things one is anxious to have. For instance, here we are, Miss Brooke—you and I. Now, I am a thorough going optimist. I believe certain things are going to happen—certain things which will be profitable and pleasing to me."

"What have I to do with them, Mr. Dallington?"

"Well, perhaps nothing, as far as that is concerned. But here we are, you and I. If I were, as I was saying, a pessimist I would think the things I have in mind couldn't happen. There you see, is where the pessimist loses out."

"Yes."

"So we are bound to recognize the advantage of optimism, are we not?"

"I haven't noticed them as yet."

"But you will if you make it a practice to be optimistic."

"Just a moment. It may be that I don't quite understand this matter. Now, if—if, just for instance—if I were to think you would ask me to be—your wife, that would be optimism, would it?"

"Er—yes."

"And if I thought there was no probability that you would propose marriage to me, that would be pessimism?"

"You have grasped the idea."

"Or, to put it as you had it at first, what one thinks will happen does happen and what one is afraid won't happen doesn't happen?"

"Of course there may be times when"—

She leaned forward and, whispering, said:

"Look at the curtain."

He looked and turned a little pale. At the bottom of the curtain he saw the tips of two shoes.

"Heavens!" he gasped. "Your father!"

"Sh-sh! Don't let him know that he is discovered."

"Miss Brooke," he said in unsteady tones, "may I have the honor of—will you become my wife?"

"If you are sure you never will be happy without me I suppose I must say yes."

After he had departed she went to the curtain and carelessly kicked aside a pair of shoes which she had placed there so that the toes would protrude a little way into the parlor.

"Yes," she said to herself; "the things one thinks will happen sometimes do happen."—S. E. Kiser in Judge.

You Can Easily Operate This Typewriter Yourself.

your correspondent.
Dont write him anything by hand that takes him time to make out—that may leave him in doubt—that he can't easily read.
And don't fill out legal papers or card memos—or make out accounts of hotel menus in your own handwriting.
It looks bad, reflects on your standing, makes people think you can't afford a stenographer, and is sometimes ambiguous.
You can write out your letters—make out an abstract—fill in an insurance policy—enter your card memos—make out your accounts, or a hotel menu—or do any kind of writing you need, on any kind, size or thickness of paper, and space any way you want on

OLIVER
Typewriter

The Standard Visible Writer.

You can write any of these things yourself if you do not happen to have a stenographer.
For you can easily learn with a little practice, to write just as rapidly, and as perfectly as an expert operator on the OLIVER. Because the OLIVER is the simplified typewriter. And you can see every word you write. About 80 per cent. more durable than any other typewriter, because it has about 80 per cent. less wearing points than most other typewriters.
Eighty per cent. easier to write with than these other complicated, intricate machines that require "humoring"—technical knowledge—long practice and special skill to operate.
Than machines which cannot be adjusted to any special space—with which it is impossible to write abstracts, insurance policies, or odd-sized documents except you buy expensive special attachments requiring experts to operate.
You can adjust the OLIVER to any reasonable space—you write on any reasonable size and thickness of paper, right out to the very edge, without the aid of any expensive attachment or special skill, and your work will be neat appearing, legible and clear.
For the OLIVER is the typewriter for the doctor, the lawyer, the insurance agent, the merchant, the hotel proprietor—or any man who does his own writing.

DEATH OF DEMOCRACY'S LEADER.

I. Freeman Rasin is dead. He was democracy's leader, and it will be a long time before Maryland sees his like again. He was a power in Baltimore, especially, an astute politician, and for 35 years held sway among Maryland Democrats, and in his death the democracy of the State is like an army bereft of its Commander. He was a remarkable reader of human nature, a good listener, but a man who seldom expressed himself. He knew the State politically, knew the working democrats in every county, made few promises, but fufilled those he did make, and whether in victory or defeat, ruled with an iron hand. He was shrewd, reticent, and all-powerful among his political followers. His home life is said to have been of the ideal sort, devoted to his children and they to him. His party will miss him, and in Mr. Rasin's death Baltimore loses one of its aggressive, prominent and energetic personalities.

OUR TRUST.

The use of the legend "In God We Trust" on some of the coins of the United States grew out of a letter written by a Maryland farmer to Salmon P. Chase when he was Secretary of the Treasury. The letter was written in November, 1861, the writer urging that we should, as a Christian people, make some recognition of the Deity on our coins. Mr. Chase referred the letter to Director Pollock of the Mint, who approved the suggestion and proposed one of the legends, "Our Country, Our God," or "God Our Trust." Mr. Chase then referred the matter to Congress, and again in 1862 and in 1863 he urged that the matter be acted on. Finally, on April 22, 1864, Congress authorized the coinage of a two-cent bronze piece and on it was stamped the legend "In God We Trust," instead of "E Pluribus Unum." Subsequently, on March 3, 1865, the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, was authorized to place the legend on all gold and silver coins susceptible of that addition thereafter to be issued. The legend is taken from the following line in "The Star Spangled Banner:" "And this be our motto: In God is our trust.".

GOVERNOR FAVORS INHERITANCE TAX.

While the majority of the voters of Maryland will probably disagree with the plea for lower taxes for corporations made by Governor Edwin Warfield at the banquet of the Old Town Merchants and Manufacturers' Association last Wednesday night, very many of them will applaud his conversion to the ranks of advocates of the inheritance tax idea promulgated by President Roosevelt. The Governor pointed out that the collateral inheritance tax in this State is but two and one-half per cent., while in other States it is as high as five and ten per cent. He also advocated that the tax be applied to direct inheritances, as well as to those derived from collateral relatives.

We find in legal treatises that there was a time when the right of a man to designate the disposal of his property after his death was not recognized at all. As a measure of public order, it was at first arranged that the State should control the disposition of the estates of decedents, and the heirs were only allowed to come into possession after the payment of a heavy fine which was nothing more or less than the original of the present inheritance tax. It will be seen that the heir has no natural or inherent right in the property of an ancestor or other relative, the rule of decedents having been adopted for reason of public policy. The man who is left a fortune, then, should not consider it a hardship to yield up to the State, which means the general public, that which really never belonged to him and which he is only permitted to retain by courtesy of the law in order to prevent disorder and to perpetuate a modification of an old feudal custom. He will also get a portion of his money back, in the way of lower taxes on the remainder of his property.

MR. AND MRS. PERCY PROCTER IN CALIFORNIA.

The Former Writes An Interesting Letter To a Friend in Oakland.

The appended letter from the facile pen of Mr. Percy Procter, who is spending the winter in California, was recently received by an Oakland friend and is presented to our readers for their perusal. The letter was dated at Pasadena, Cal., March 5th, and is as follows:

Two weeks ago today Mrs. Proctor and I arrived in California and a week ago today we saw the Pacific Ocean for the first time.

The prospect of three days and three nights on the cars from Chicago to Pasadena was rather appalling. One finds the six-hour ride from Oakland to Washington fatiguing. But seventy-two hours! I asked an acquaintance who has crossed the Continent several times how he managed. He said that for a week before he started he practiced dressing and undressing under the dining room table.

Contrary to expectation the three days and three nights passed quickly and pleasantly. We were able to secure a drawingroom in one of the Pullman cars, that insured privacy and comfort. The forward car was fitted up as a gentleman's sitting room, with easy chairs, writing desks and a barber shop. Periodicals and daily newspapers were supplied free of charge and the market was posted daily. Pressing a button brought a colored brother in white jacket and apron, but he had little to do. I thought that on a journey like this when men had so much time on their hands, there would be considerable liquor consumed, but such was not the case. This instance is but one of many that the greatest consumption of intoxicating liquors is by those who can least afford to pay for them. Following the cafe car came the dining car, which was part of the train all the way. Meals were served from seven to ten, from twelve to two and from six to eight. Breakfast and luncheon were served a la carte, so that one could have what one wished and pay for it only. The dinner in the evening was at a fixed price, one dollar, and, while not as pretentious as dinners served on dining cars in the East, was much better, each article being good as to quality and liberal as to quantity. The company maintains bakeries, lunch counters, restaurants and hotels throughout the southwest and is able constantly to replenish the stocks of food on passing dining cars. So we had fresh bread, cake, milk, eggs, etc., daily. Following the dining car came the Pullman sleeping cars and last of all was the observation car, similar to those run on trains No. 1 and 2 between Cincinnati and Washington. This car was really the lounging car for women. It also was supplied with magazines and writing materials. There did not appear to be any electric connection between this car and the colored brother in white jacket and apron. Wherever during the day time the train stopped for ten minutes or more the car porter gave notice and the passengers all got off for exercise and fresh air. It will be inferred that, with hours spent in dining car and observation car, with short walks at strange towns, and with a constantly changing panorama of scenes and sights, time passed pleasantly and quickly.

The morning after leaving Chicago, Kansas City was reached and all day the train ran through the great agricultural state of Kansas. One was struck with the large size of the fields. Slightly rolling or almost level, free from stones and roots, they appeared easy of cultivation and capable of producing the enormous crops of corn for which Kansas is noted. Although the farms are large and the farm houses far apart, yet because of the flat country, a farm house always was in sight and made the country seem to be more closely settled than it really is. The farm yards were untidy as a rule, due no doubt to the lack of sufficient men to care for so many acres. There are many farms in Garrett county much better cared for than any seen in Kansas from the car window.

A corner only of Colorado was crossed. Here for the first time were seen adobe (pronounced ad-o-be) houses, one story affairs made of sun-baked mud, and cow boys. The fields were larger in Colorado than in Kansas. Usually there was but one enclosure of several hundred acres on each ranch, besides the fence around house and barn, and in it cattle and horses were allowed to run at will. There were very small barns, as hay is stacked in the open and stock remain out winter and summer, day and night. Here and there could be seen a windmill and stock water tank in the fields. There is little farming in south eastern Colorado, most of the land being devoted to stock raising. The word "farm" also ceases to be used west of Kansas and the word "ranch" takes its place. Not many ranch owners live on their property, but have their residences in nearby towns and villages, leaving the animals to be looked after by cow boys or to take care of themselves. Hence, farm houses, surrounded with out buildings, fruit trees and gardens, are rarely seen. The climate, however, is indiscribable. Your correspondent has traveled in Europe, Asia, Africa and America, but nowhere has he seen such a clear atmosphere, blue sky and bright sun as were in evidence the day he passed through Colorado. Out of the yellow, gray, or greenish earth rose gray, red and purple mountains, many of them snow-capped, though the sun was almost unbearably hot. They were miles away, though seeming close at hand. Pike's Peak, more than seventy miles away, was pointed out.

New Mexico and Arizona were next traversed. The characteristics of Colorado were marked in eastern New Mexico, but gradually the soil grew poorer, the mountains smaller, and trees disappeared altogether. In their place came cactus, sage brush and odd appearing shrubs growing up through the sand. Mexicans composed the track gangs and inhabited the few adobe huts clustered here and there along the line. Besides Trinidad, Colorado, and Las Vegas and Albuquerque, New Mexico, there were no towns of importance between the Kansas and California state lines, though so-called railroad stations, which are shipping plants for distant mines and ranches, are numerous. Telegraph stations are so far apart that signal boxes are attached to telegraph poles to enable train men to send in signals when trains get into difficulties, just as policemen in cities ring for fire engines or patrol wagons. We spent the entire day traversing the Mojave desert. The only break was in crossing the Colorado River from Arizona into California. Here the water permitted willow and other trees and green grass and flowers to grow. The sight of the young, green leaves was very refreshing. Indians appeared in Arizona for the first time—repulsive looking women with beads and feather work to sell tourists. Experienced travelers advised against purchases, as the articles for sale, made amidst dirt and filth, are apt to spread disease. At a distance, with adobe huts for a background, these indian women were picturesque. The desert lasted until after nightfall, so we were unable to see the beauties of the famous ride from San Bernandino to Pasadena.

This hotel—Hotel Maryland—was given its name by its projector, Mr. Colin Stewart of Baltimore. The name, suggestive of fried chicken and hospitality, has proved a mascot and the house has been uniformly successful. The guests come from all over the United States north of the Ohio and east of the Missouri river, with a few from Canada and northwestern states. This hotel accommodates four hundred people, but there are three other hotels, open during the season, December to May, that are larger. The Maryland people here are Mr. and Mrs. Colin Stewart and ourselves. Others with Maryland names are Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Broadwater, Helena, Monrana, Dr. and Mrs. W. F. Fundenburg and Dr. Geo. B. Fundenburg, Pittsburg, Penn.

One cannot realize what a great country this is until he has crossed the continent. And all are alike Americans in feelings and sentiments. One evening, during dinner, the orchestra was playing a medley of patriotic airs and when "The Star Spangled Banner" was begun, all the people arose instantly and stood still until the last bar was played, and then they applauded.

Yours truly,
PERCY PROCTER.

Letter to H. Weber & Sons.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sirs: They won't fool him any more with paste paint; they'll try something-else!

Editor Saulsbury, Dover, Delaware, having used 35 gallons paste paint on his house, bought 35 gallons Devoe for it. He had enough left for a new stable 20 by 20 and fence, and returned four gallons.

Paste paint has as many tricks as a bunco-steerer.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mrs. J. A. Hayden just returned from a visit of a week at Westernport, Cumberland and Frostburg.

Little Yough river at this point was higher to-day (Wednesday) than for a number of years. The entire glade front was inundated.

At the M. E. church services Sunday morning three were received into full connection and seven on probation. A number will be admitted later.

We learn that all the hotels save one have been leased for the coming season, and negotiations are on for the lease of the remaining one.

A number of the large oak trees near the Auditorium and Tabernacle are being removed lest they be blown down and damage the buildings. The Auditorium was slightly damaged during the winter by a falling tree.

Material is being put on the ground by Street Supervisor Echard for the new eight foot board walk from the "Y" to the east entrance to the Auditorium. This walk will cost about eight hundred dollars.

AUSTRIAN MURDERED WHILE HE WAS ASLEEP

Rowlesburg the Scene of Cold Blooded Crime.

There was a very cold-blooded murder at Rowlesburg, west of Oakland, Saturday night about 9:30 o'clock and the murderer is now at large in the mountains of Preston county, W. Va.

Two Austrians, employed on the Morgantown and Kingwood Railroad company's tracks, got into a quarrel on Saturday afternoon over some work that was to be done that evening but the foreman of the gang quelled the trouble, for the time being at least. That night, after the shanty camp of the Austrians was wrapped in slumber, one of the aggrieved parties went to the sleeping bunk of the other, pulled the bed clothing off of him and without a word of warning shot him five times in the breast with a 38 calibre revolver. Death came to the poor fellow instantly.

A fellow countryman of the two was awakened by the noise and perceived what the man had done he caught hold of him to detain him, but the murderer reached his revolver back over his shoulder and discharged the remaining two chambers of the seven-shooter almost in the captor's face.

The murderer then broke away and escaped to the mountains. Sheriff Wm. M. Schaeffer, of Preston county, and a posse are after him, but it is doubtful if they ever find him.

The murdered man was Thos. Gaul, and he was quite popular and much of a leader with his fellow countrymen. This is the second murder of the kind that has occurred in Rowlesburg within a year.

Honor Roll of Accident School.

The following named pupils merited 100 per cent. in deportment and made an average of not less than 95 per cent. in daily studies for February:

Bank Building Destroyed.

Fire at Tunnelton, West, Va., thirty miles west of Oakland, last Tuesday night, destroyed the Tunnelton Bank building, owned by Mr. J. A. Bonafield. The structure was erected about three years ago and was built of stone. The lower floor was occupied by the bank, and two stores. On the second floor were the offices of the Merchants' Coal Company and the West Virginia Northern Railroad. The loss will amount to $20,000.

WHAT IS A SAFE BANK?

To many people, a bank is a BANK, no matter how or who runs it, or what capital it has. Few stop to consider that there is a great difference in banks and that money is much sefer in some than in others. The most essential points in safety is:

AMPLE CAPITAL, COMPETENT OFFICERS, HONEST MANAGEMENT, No Speculation on Ousside Business Investments.

Our officers do not speculate, they have no interest in any outside busiess, consequently no funds of the bank are used for private gain by any of them. We call your attention to these facts in particular, because they are the cause of three-fourths of all bank failures.

WE INVITE YOU TO DO YOUR BANKING WITH US.

One of the latest trusts is a trust of the manufacturers of road making machinery. This has an unpleasant not to say an ominous sound. What would be hailed with unbounded expressions of delight by rural populations every where would be a road making trust, provided of course, that adequate guarantees were forth coming that it meant business and was really in earnest in providing the country with better roads.

Attention is directed to the advertisements of the Oakland and Friendsville Normal Schools which appear in these columns today. The Oakland school will have for its instructors Profs. Morris K. ## REBUILDING OF THE OLD NATIONAL ROAD

Pennsylvania May Restore Historic Turnpike Built Early Last Century.

There is a strong sentiment among members of the Pennsylvania legislature in favor of the passage of the bill appropriating $200,000 for the rebuilding of part of the famous National road in Southwestern Pennsylvania, and early action on the measure is expected. It is pointed out that the commonwealth has an obligation to fulfill in caring for this historic turnpike, having received it in good condition from the National government many years ago with the understanding that it would be maintained in proper manner.

The road was projected early in the last century to run from Washington through Maryland, Pennsylvania, what is now West Virginia, Ohio and Indiana, the objective point being St. Louis. It was built in parts, the section in Pennsylvania being in Somerset, Fayette and Washington counties. About 1830 steps were taken to turn it over to the states wherein it lay, but in the case of Pennsylvania objection was made that the road had fallen into decay and the commonwealth's officers declined to assume charge unless Congress put it into good condition. An appropriation of $300,000 was made for the purpose and a good part of the highway reconstructed so that in 1835 the Pennsylvania authorities were satisfied with it and the title passed to the Keystone state.

Since then the road has been in the jurisdiction of the state, the only stretch of road in the whole commonwealth to be solely a state road. Until two years ago it was maintained by tolls collected at the toll houses which were at frequent intervals along the road, but in 1905 the legislature abolished the toll houses and made an appropriation of $100,000 to maintain the road. The state has already built some fine concrete bridges and is asking bids for the rebuiling of two sections. This, with the survey and other work, will use up most of the money and unless the appropriation asked is granted the state will be without funds to maintain its own road and will be in the position of having laws requiring townships to maintain roads when it may be without funds to care for its own. From an economic standpoint the road is very valuable and its maintenance is much desired.

TERRIFIC THUNDER STORM.

First of the Preseut Season Prevailed Tuesday Evening.

The first severe electrical storm of the present season occurred in this section Tuesday night, when peal after peal of sharp thunder accompanied by vivid flashes of lightning which illuminated the heavens in all directions prevailed from about eight until eleven o'clock.

Rain in torrents poured down, continuing during the entire night which has resulted in the raising of the waters to a high stage.

Monday large flocks of migratory birds—geese, ducks and other water fowl—were seen passing over town. Out Hooppole road two miles a flock of about a hundred geese settled in an open field where they fed several hours before being disturbed.

Bluebirds, robins and other summer birds have come and it now looks as through spring is about to open.

Stallions for Sale.

We have a pair of thoroughbred registered Percheron Stallions, aged four and five years respectively, which we will sell at an exceptionally low price to any Garrett county stockman. These horses are kind, gentle and thoroughly broken to both double and single harness and weigh 1800 pounds each. Will sell one or both animals. A special price to purchaser will be made upon guarantee that the horses will be kept in Garrett county for stock purposes at least two years from date of sale. These horses were bred and raised on Bond Bros. stock farm in Jefferson county, Pa., and belong to the famous Brilliant family which stands at the head of the Percheron stud. ### WARNING TO FARMERS.

State Entomologist Symons Advices Spraying Fruit Trees.

This paper was in receipt of the following letter from State Entomologist Symons Tuesday morning with the request that it be given publicity through these columns:

Much depends upon the activity of the general fruit grower at this time of the year as to the life of his trees in the future and quality of his fruit this season. The San Jose Scale is generally disseminated throughtout the state. Even if you are sure your trees have not this pest among them, it would be money well spent to spray them as a preventative as well as to add vigor to the trees.

Trees infested with the above scale must be treated at least once a year and should be sprayed while the trees are dormant. We find that with our experiments, the late application in the spring just before the buds opens, seems to be the most satisfactory time

We, therefore, urge every orchardist or person who has a few trees to give them attention and spray them this year with the lime-sulphur wash, which we find to be the best insecticide for the control of this pest.

The Department stands ready to aid all persons in the state as to giving further instructions in making and applying the spray mixture, both by personal as well as public demonstrations. It also stands ready to enforce the law in direfully neglected cases and we will give our prompt attention to complaints in any vicinity where such cases exists. Get your materials and apparatus ready to commence work at a favorable time. The most convenient method of making the lime-sulphur wash and a discussion of the other insecticides on the market in this state, are given in bulletin No. 112 published by the Maryland Experimental Station, a copy of which can be had for the asking.

Any further information will be gladly given.

EGLON, W. VA.

I have concluded to send you a few items relating some of the doings in this neighborhood.

Messrs. Scherr & Hays are doing a fine business at the old stand.

Our young people have been enjoying hugely the fine sleighing and the doctor has a good partner on his many trips.

Rev. Koser, since last Sunday, has an assistant in his work.

Many strangers are around who seem to be prosepecting for oil and talk of leasing and buying, hence many changes are expected.

The Cost of Coal.

The cost of coal for steam locomotives is approximately 15 per cent of the total operating expenses for steam railroads, and is the largest of the expenses for materials, says the Electric Railway Review. Data contained in the annual reports of a numher of the larger systems indicate that the annual coal consumption is, on the average, about 2,500 tons for each steam locomotive. From the United States census report on "Street and Electric Railways," covering 700 operating companies the cost of fuel for power for electric railways appears to be about $15,000,000, which is a little over 10.5 per cent of the total operating expenses.—The Engineer.

Don't look on the bright side of anything. Don't permit yourself to see good in anyone. Don't have any charity for your erring brother or sister. If you have any of the milk of human kindness in your heart, curdle it in some way. Believe that all men, and women too, are liars, and the truth is not in them. Find fault with your fellowman. Say mean things about your neighbor: envy her; hate her; seek your own; scrap if you don't get it; think evil; rejoice in iniquity; endure nothing; believe nothing, and if you are not completely miserable and unhappy it is because you have not yet quenched the last vital spark of love in your being.

TRUSTEE'S SALE

A Peripatetic Wooing.

By RITA KELLEY.

Copyright, 1907, by Homer Sprague.

Eloise was having thoughts. That they were not pleasant thoughts was proved by the hurry with which she donned her tan ulster and close brown walking hat and slipped out of the house. She hurried down brilliantly lighted Broadway, hoping that the new experience of being alone, unchaperoned, unprotected, amid the rush of life on all sides, might divert her mind. She was halted at last by a man with a megaphone. He was shouting: "All aboard for Chinatown! Right this way. Tickets two dollars. All aboard for Chinatown!"

She looked up at the huge, ugly "rubberneck wagon," now fairly transformed into a bower of beauty of red, white and blue electric lights and Chinese lanterns bobbing in the chill breeze. It seemed to offer surcease from the insistent uncomfortable thoughts at the back of her brain. The old wagon in its brave array held some of the allurements of fairyland and its happy irresponsibility, and on the spur of the moment she whipped out her purse from her ulster pocket, bought her ticket and climbed in among the lanterns well toward the front.

"WHAT ARE YOU DOING HERE?" HE DEMANDED.

George had dared to insinuate that she could not get along without him. He had acted as if he were as much a part of her life as her daily ride in the park, her nights at the opera, her cotillon favors. Worse still, there had been, too, the suggestion that he was so much a part of her existence that she could not get along without him. Other girls were wooed and hard won. She was taken for granted. And she wanted romance—"heart interest" she had heard it called when the drama was under consideration. All her life had the conventional been wrapped around her like a dun colored cloak. She would have freedom from conventionality—and George.

A thrill of anticipation ran through her as the big, clumsy vehicle wheeled cautiously and threaded its way down the crowded streets. Through the Tenderloin, the Ghetto, the Bowery—all those localities of which she had heard, but never seen—it went. When it halted at last she was in the front of the party, still determinedly eager to get outside of herself. The conductor had taken her under his wing, and she felt very safe and sure.

They had climbed up and up and up many winding, creaking, unsafe stairs to the joss house, a heathenish, garish place filled with a mixture of rare carvings, embroideries, ivories and apparently worthless junk. The conductor of the party waited to give his explanation until the loiterers had gone.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "wait a few minutes, and I will explain this interesting place. There are some people present who did not come with the party and who are waiting in the hope that they will get the benefit of what I am about to tell you."

A little woman in a blue tailored suit edged her way with asperity into the crowd.

"Do you mean me?" she demanded. "I guess we have as good a right to be here as any one. And we'll stay here till we are ready to go."

The conductor turned to Eloise for approbation.

"The members of this party have each paid $2 for this valuable information, and it is not fair to them to allow you to hear this for nothing. I know your kind. You have been following us around just to get this information free. Not a night passes but I have trouble of this kind, and it's got to stop."

The little woman fought off her friends who strove to lead her away.

"And who are you that you should talk to me that way?" she cried. "Do you know who I am? I'll have you arrested for insulting a lady. My brother is down now looking for a policeman. Do you hear?" she shrieked, maddened by her inability to impress the cool conductor.

There was a commotion in the doorway, and two men pushed through and thrust their fists under the conductor's nose.

"I'll report you," they yelled, "for insulting a lady."

Eloise turned sick. She pushed out of the excited crowd, past the two emaciated, imperturbable old Chinamen behind their little trinket counter and fled to the balcony overlooking the main street of the Chinese quarter.

It was horribly low. She shuddered at the thought of where she was and under what protection as she gazed down from the lantern hung balcony into the street crowded with Chinese in their native dress—their pig faces, long cues and long nailed fingers holding paper bags filled with vegetables.

"Eloise!"

She jumped at the sound of her name and a man's step on the balcony and pressed back against the wall of the house, staring with wild eyes at the man before her.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded. "Why, you have never been out like this! What does it mean?"

She gathered her forces suddenly for retaliation.

"What if I haven't?" she said, somewhat breathlessly. "I am old enough to do as I choose—and—it is not in the least your affair what I do!"

She pushed past him into the incense laden interior to have the conductor present her with a package of joss sticks and a slip of paper covered with Chinese characters.

"A fortune," he said gallantly. "Ask your Chinese laundryman to read it for you."

"I haven't a Chinese laundryman," she exclaimed passionately, "and I never will have one!"

She ran almost blindly down the stairs and into the street, trusting to her instinct for locality to guide her to the nearest subway station. The orientals fell back in wild astonishment at sight of her fleeing figure, and a few fat old fellows said unintelligible things to her which caused a roar of laughter.

Her cheeks were burning, her breath was coming in gasps, as she came into the little square marking the one time wickedest place in New York. All at once she felt that she was being followed. Quick, light footfalls were coming behind her, were keeping pace with hers, and terror clutched her heart. A few drunken men sprawled on the park benches. To return was impossible. She could never find the "rubberneck" party. There was nothing to do but keep on as best she could.

She emerged from the park ready to drop with exhaustion and was obliged to slow down to get her breath. To her relief she found the steps had stopped, and no one was in sight. She went on and on through the better streets of the wholesale district and at last saw the twinkling lights of surface cars ahead. She reached for her purse. It was gone!

She stopped stock still on a corner, frozen with horror. Alone at 11 o'clock at night on a deserted street, with no money and home miles away! The ills of her guarded, pampered life showed uppermost in this dilemma. A less favored girl would have known what to do. She stood there dazed, helpless, till the sound of rapidly approaching footsteps startled her into action. She sprang forward.

"Eloise!" A man's voice echoed her name commandingly among the skyscrapers.

She collapsed all in a heap on the curbstone.

"You—you—lovable girl," he said, looking down at her limp person struggling for breath.

"Oh, George," she panted, "I didn't know it was you!"

He sat down on the curb beside her.

"I thought you did," he said.

"And there wasn't any real danger?" she asked, wide eyed. "Oh, what a simpleton!"

"None at all except from the ogre me," he laughed shortly.

"Oh, George, you are simply fine!"

"You didn't think so last week this time," he said relentlessly.

"But you didn't insist," she pouted. "A girl likes to be convinced."

"Oh, you—you—I will say it—foolish girl!" he said, with adoring eyes.

The Word "Explode."

"Explosive" was first used in its modern sense in the first quarter of the nineteenth century. "Explode" in the sense of "blow up" or "go off" is scarcely a century older. Before that people talked of a ball being "exploded" from a gun, the clouds "exploding" lightning or a volcano "exploding" lava, but that was very much nearer the word's original sense of driving away with scorn. "Explode," in fact, is literally to clap away and was a technical word for driving an actor off the stage by contemptuous handclapping. That is the real meaning of an "exploded idea."

Her Glance Backward.

In a Broadway car long past midnight a robust, motherly woman sat with a well grown boy of about fifteen beside her. The boy had fallen asleep, and his head rested heavily against her shoulder.

A man entering the car was cordially greeted by the woman and was about to slap the boy on the knee when the mother interposed.

"Don't wake him," she pleaded. "He's so big now that he is ashamed of doing childish things. This is the first time in a year that he has been my baby boy again. Let me enjoy it."—New York Globe.

Takes Note of His Sensations to Determine Whether It Is the Brain or the Feet—His Contention Suffers Interruption.

[Copyright, 1907, by C. H. Sutcliffe.]

Mr. Bowser had been quiet and preoccupied all the evening, and Mrs. Bowser, although she had noticed his attitude, had failed to make any remark on it for fear of starting him off on some tangent. It got to be 9 o'clock, and he could stand it no longer. After walking the floor for two or three minutes he said:

"Mrs. Bowser, did you ever hear of Sir James Bull, the celebrated English physician?"

"I think I have seen his name mentioned," she carelessly replied.

"And perhaps you may have seen the name of Dr. Delos of France mentioned?"

"I can't say. Dr. So-and-so is bringing out a consumption cure today, and some other doctor is following with a cure for something else to morrow, and one can't keep track of half the names he sees on the bottles in the drug stores."

"Good heavens!" he groaned after regarding her with a look of mingled pity and contempt. "I have mentioned

"WELL, WHAT ABOUT THESE DOCTORS?"

the names of two of the greatest physicians in the world, and you connect them with corn cures and cough sirups! Woman, can't your mind get beyond the buying of a two dollar corset for a dollar and forty cents at some bargain sale?"

"Well, what about these great doctors?"

"It will be a waste of breath to tell you, but just now they are engaged in a controversy that I can perhaps help settle. It occurred to me this morning that I could, and I have been thinking about it all day. If I should prove the means of so doing it would make me famous in a day."

"And just what is this question, Mr. Bowser? Even if I do attend bargain sales perhaps my opinion on other subjects is worth something."

"I will state the case, but I warn you in advance that I won't stand for any of your sarcasms. If you can't treat it seriously you needn't answer at all. You know what sleep is, of course. All creation has to sleep. You have sometimes realized the fact that you were dropping off to sleep. Now, then, what part of the human being goes to sleep first? Is it the feet, the brain, the legs, arms, eyes or what? There is the question in a nutshell. Dr. Bull says one thing and Dr. Delos another, and between them they have got a million people interested. Have you any information to offer?"

Assurance Equal to Ignorance.

"I simply contend that sleep is what may be called a natural anaesthetic, and that it affects the brain first. I don't think there can be any question about that."

"Your assurance is equal to your ignorance. You stand in opposition to a thousand wise men. That's just like a woman. She'll blurt out an opinion on any subject as glibly as a parrot and with as little sense to back it."

"And how about your opinion?" asked Mrs. Bowser.

"I have none at present. I am going to make an experiment this evening in order to help me form one. You can now go to bed. The cat is to be turned out doors. I shall stretch myself out on the lounge with notebook and pencil in hand and record my feelings until lost in slumber. I can't find that any one has done that to settle this controversy."

"You will probably get up with a cold in your head after an hour or so."

"That will be entirely my affair, Mrs. Bowser. Will you now escort that yaller eyed cat downstairs and throw him out and give him to understand that the first meow he utters from the back fence will be the signal for his death?"

"If you wake up with your head all stuffed up, don't blame me," she answered as she drove the cat before her.

"Men have often given their lives to settle questions not so grave as this," he replied, with much pomposity and dignity.

Ten minutes later he was alone. The gas was turned out to one burner, and he stretched himself on the lounge and prepared to record for the benefit of science. He lost no time in beginning:

"Have assumed as easy position. House quiet. Mrs. Bowser gone to bed. No care on my mind.

"Am looking up at the ceiling. The popcorn man is passing the house and calling his wares, but I am seeking to make myself oblivious of the fact.

"Big toe on the left foot begins to feel numb. Is it possible that sleep first makes its appearance through the toes?

"I seem to feel a slight draft of cold air on my head. Perhaps that is the pressure of drowsiness.

"There is an itching sensation in the right heel. Am I about to discover that humanity goes to sleep through its heels? If so, all theories thus far advanced will fall to the ground and the Bowser theory take their places.

"Draft of cold continues. Must the human scalp become cooled off before sleep will come? This line of thought is worth following.

"Right leg suddenly gave a jerk.

"Left leg seemed to want to get up off the lounge.

On Brink of a Discovery.

"I don't want to rush things, but it seems to me that I am on the brink of an important discovery.

"I have just felt a twitching of the ears.

"The jerk of the right leg has been renewed.

"In my thoughts I had gone back to boyhood days when both legs suddenly drew up at once as if I was trying to climb a ladder.

"As the above motions were followed by a numb feeling in the back of my neck nothing is yet decided.

"More twitching of the ears.

"Strange sensations in both big toes.

"How Mrs. Bowser can go to bed and snore away with such a momentous question undecided is a puzzle to me.

"My eyes are now fastened on one particular spot on the ceiling, and I am thinking of the cider mill down on the old farm.

"I now see the mill just as it used to stand.

"I now start to enter it to take a drink.

"The mill now vanishes.

"I think sleep is coming. While I am not exactly satisfied, it seems to come more from the brain than the feet. No one's feet can think of a cider mill.

"I may be dreaming or I may be awake, but it seems to me as if I could hear the wailing of cats in the back yard.

"As near as I can make out, my right foot shot out a moment ago, as if kicking a feline.

"A sort of a numb feeling in the right shoulder.

"The prickly sensation is present in both heels.

"The body seems to be almost asleep, while the brain is still active.

"It seems to me that there are cats in the kitchen downstairs, but, of course, this is impossible. Am I to discover that one has to think of cats for half an hour or so before slumber will come? If so, the statement is bound to make a great sensation.

"Have tried to turn my thoughts into various other channels, but they arbitrarily return to cats.

"I think I hear cats softly ascending the basement stairs.

"I think I hear them in this very room.

"I think they are led by our own yaller eyed old feline, and that"—

Failed to Announce Theory.

But the data ended there. Yells of terror brought Mrs. Bowser, who had not yet gone to bed, downstairs, and the sight that greeted her eyes was a lively one. She had left the back door open in turning out the cat, and he, followed by half a dozen others of his tribe, had entered to see how Mr. Bowser's theory was panning out. Some disagreement took place after they had reached the sitting room, and as the lounge seemed to be the strategic point all made for it, and Mr. Bowser was instantly buried under a mass of fighting cats.

Why try to picture the situation in words? Why seek to reproduce his yells and whoops and swear words? Why give the details of the wild fleeing and the wilder pursuit and the language addressed to the laughing Mrs. Bowser when the last feline had struck the snowdrifts in the back yard? Let it suffice that the Bowser theory on how sleep comes has not yet been put forth to the world, and he may never again seek to solve it.

The Evil of Railroad Rebates

...By... WILLIAM J. GAYNOR, Justice of the New York Supreme Court.

THE effect of wealth, provided it be acquired on equal terms of competition—that is to say, without the favor, connivance OR DISCRIMINATION of government or the aid of statutes—cannot be pernicious to republican institutions, but, on the contrary, tends to the healthy activity, welfare and happiness of the community and hence to the PERPETUITY of such institutions.

There is no danger of the confiscation of private property in this country any more than in England. But the acquisition of private property by the dishonest use of public franchises and the aid of cunning statutes is a very different thing. It is more than a menace to our republican institutions. It is fraught with their DESTRUCTION if suffered to continue. The moral odium of it would in the end debase us all, and no debased people can in the nature of things remain a free, self governing people.

It has been difficult to get some people to understand that our railroads are not private roads, but are PUBLIC HIGHWAYS, just as much so as our roads which run alongside of them.

A railroad is not a private monopoly, although we must acknowledge that those in control of our railroads are, in their origin and the very law of their being public highways, subject to the regulation and control of government. Every one may use them on equal terms. Any favoritism in rates is absolutely unlawful AND ALWAYS WAS.

IT IS THE GUILTY RAILROAD OFFICIAL, HOWEVER HIGH, AND EVEN THOUGH HE MAY HAVE ARISEN TO A HIGH PLACE IN THE COUNSELS AND GOVERNMENT OF THE NATION, OR IF HE BE ONLY THE LOCAL STATION AGENT IN THE VILLAGE OR THE LONELIEST PLACE, WHO SHOULD BE PROSECUTED.

This favoritism in freight rates is the greatest crime of our day and generation. To allow one man or set of men to have their freight carried over the public highways at a rate so much lower than that which their rivals in business are charged as to enable them to undersell such rivals AND EVEN DRIVE THEM OUT OF BUSINESS is so heartless and so damnable that we shall be looked back upon by our descendants and by the future historian as a generation lost to moral sense for having suffered such a condition to exist so long.

This favoritism in freight rates has been such a DEEP SEATED abuse that it is not to be eradicated in years. Those who are profiting by it—namely, the few who control our railroads, our iron highways, and then principally the great trusts, and lastly politicians and public men who are in their pay—are not to give up easily such a source of wealth and power.

It is my belief that the GOVERNMENT should appoint the general freight agent of every railroad, and it may have to do so, for he, through his subordinates, could stop the abuse at once.

THE DUTY OF SUCH OFFICIALS WOULD NOT BE TO FIX RATES, BUT TO SEE THAT EVERY ONE PAID THE PRESCRIBED RATE, NO MORE AND NO LESS.

The Morality of Americans.

By LUDWIG FULDA, Eminent German Dramatist and Poet.

AMERICA is a far more moral country than Germany. Its educational system is equal to the best of Europe. In women's colleges the United States excels, and THE AMERICAN WOMAN LEADS THE WORLD. German parents might well send their daughters to America for higher education, and the spirit they would bring back would do Germany much good.

The MORAL LIFE of the American people is on a higher plane than that of Germany. Without a question the life of the young people is purer, the demeanor of men among themselves less frivolous. One sees less of vice on the streets of the large cities than on those of our own.

The belief that the American woman lords it over the sterner sex, an idea prevalent in Europe, is unfounded. Conditions there provide for meeting more on an equal footing rather than have the one lord it over the other. As a result of the mingling of the sexes from early childhood American marriages, on the whole, are happier, for the man and the woman HAVE LEARNED TO UNDERSTAND THEMSELVES and better know the shortcomings of the other and the better side as well. There a young couple has years in which to pass judgment on the question of marriage, while in Germany the daughter is virtually THROWN UPON THE MARKET by her parents before she has learned anything about the opposite sex.

ONE RESULT OF THE AMERICAN CONDITION IS THAT CELIBACY IS NOT LOOKED UPON BY AMERICAN WOMEN AS SOMETHING TO BE DREADED. SINGLE WOMEN ARE LOOKED UPON WITH EQUAL RESPECT AND HONOR TO THOSE SHOWN THEIR MARRIED SISTERS.

America's Prosperity Is Overwhelming Her.

By JACOB H. SCHIFF, Multimillionaire New York Banker.

THE conditions in which we find ourselves at present appear much misunderstood, particularly in Europe. It is a fact that we are suffering from AN EXCESS OF PROSPERITY which is simply overwhelming us. Our industries cannot find labor with which to master the orders pouring in upon them. Our railroads are in need of equipment and ADDITIONAL FACILITIES to handle the immense business of the country, and the banks can only furnish part of the working capital with which to do the UNPRECEDENTED COMMERCE which has developed.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

There are great revolutions taking place in educational matters. Schools are conducted very differently from what they were in the days that our grandfathers went to school. Among the many radical changes that have taken place is that one of not using the rod as it used to be. The theory today is to spare both the rod and the child. However, one of the most marked differences between the old and the new education is in the standards of school-building construction. The change is not seen so much in Garrett county as it is in the cities, but within a few years the movement will be felt here; however, as it is today, the school buildings in Garrett county are being built much better than they were twenty-five years ago. Not long ago, in Baltimore, a fearless lecturer said:

"I met a farmer on the road and I asked him: 'What did that little red school house over there on the hill cost?'

" 'Two hundred dollars.'

" 'What did that barn over there cost.'

" 'Two thousand dollars.'

" 'What have you got in the school house.'

" 'Children.'

" 'What have you got in the barn.'

" 'Cows.' "

The lecturer then pointed out that the new education stands for something better than this condition of affairs. It asks, "Aren't your children as valuable as your cows?"

WHEN GRANDPA WENT TO SCHOOL.

The Baltimore "Sun," in a recent issue, published the following short article under the above heading. However, it should be well understood by the people of this county that the school board is not the body to be blamed with the shortcomings which may appear in our educational system; the board acts simply as the spenders of the money which is placed in their hands by the people of the State; they cannot spend more than is given to them by the tax payers. The schools can progress only as the people grow in sympathy with the movement, and are willing to spend money which will promote the interests of our schools; the people must be willing to have the children kept in as well-built houses as are those in which the cattle are protected. However, great advancements come slowly.

The article from the "Sun," reads as follows: "In former days the school house was a meager affair in both country and town. In the country it was a little ramshackle building, with one chimney and a door, and a water bucket behind the door. In winter it was heated by a stove somewhat less than half as big as the house. Those who managed to get places near the stove roasted and those who didn't froze. The school was "ventilated" by raising all the windows at once, which furnished employment for the family doctor for weeks to come. In town, it was not much better, the children being huddled into ill-suited, ill-ventilated rooms in crowded sections. Today, the large cities and some of the smaller ones have set a new standard. Believing that children are the most important asset of the community, whether that community be a vast metropolis like New York or a growing young town, taxpayers all over the country are voting for schools worthy the name.

The following article has been received for publication in the series:

A PLEA FOR SCHOOL SPIRIT.

Much has been said in our series of articles concerning the influe ce on our schools of the teacher, the trustees, and of the school board; but to my mind as a teacher, these must all become secondary to another unmentioned influence, the point of view of the parent.

We have a good corps of teachers; we keep up their efficiency by frequent examinations; we keep their hearts in the work by means of reading circles and county institutes; and yet the schools of our county are behind those of every other section of the State; the question is, Why?

We were told that we must have a nine months' term. But, are we ready for it?. In most of our rural schools the teacher finds herself unable to begin actual work until the winter has set in, and so closed all chances of the children obtaining outdoor employment. Again in the spring, her attendance becomes visibly diminished. Can a nine months' term accomplish any good result when the children do not attend regularly? Frequently, in answer to an inquiry as the course of yesterday's absence, the teacher receives such answer as, "Mamma needed me at home," or "I had some work to do," from these facts we can draw but one conclusion. Parents, it is your fault that your child makes no progress.

To place our schools on a higher basis, the parents must change their point of view. The average father of Garrett County makes a small, but comfortable living. He expects his children, as soon as they are old enouge, to aid him in the struggle for bread. When circumstances are such that they cannot help in that struggle, he turns them over to the school teacher, then thinks he has done what he can, and dismisses the matter from his mind. In this he is wrong. He should contrive to have the children attend regularly. If, in no other way, but by giving them all a winter's schooling in turn, without any absences to the one attending, and then have the one who is doing the work at home study with the one attending the school. The parents aught to see that they study at night at home. There are born teachers who can take no better assets than fragmentary attendance and indifferent parents, and so interest the children that they will work of their own accord. But those teachers are sadly very scarce, especially so in Garrett County; the average teacher must depend upon the parents.

Such being the case, let us make it our business to help out the teachers. Let us not look upon the school and the teacher as a sort of necessary nuisance. Let us not get the habit of sending the child to school only when we can find no other place for it. Rather let us send that child every day, and trouble ourselves to see that it studies out of school. When we can do this, then let us have a nine months' school. Then we will find this extension of time followed by the county having a better corps of teachers, for better ones will come here and will stay, for then they will have employment for nine months, and not for only seven and a half; as it is today, many excellent teachers leave this county to teach elsewhere, and many are kept from coming to teach in this county owing to the shortness of our term; they go and stay, these excellent teachers, where they can get employment for nine months each year.

TRAMP HAD TO BE SHOWN.

His Scheme to Get an Apple Did Not Work at Grocery.

"Sir," said the tramp to the grocer as he turned his back to the hot stove and looked longingly at a basket of red apples, "the returns to the agricultural department this year show that the apple crop reached the enormous yield of over 150,000,000 barrels, saying nothing of those saved out for cider."

"Don't doubt it at all," said the grocer.

"Under those circumstances doesn't it look to you as if you might spare me one single apple?"

"Not at all."

"Sir," continued the tramp as he backed two inches nearer the stove, "all medical men are agreed that the apple is a necessity to human health. The system needs the phosphates contained in such fruit. You agree with me, do you?"

"I would have agreed with you a year ago, but now it's different. Something better has been found. See here."

And he took the tramp by the shoulder and led him to the door and gave him a shove out into the cold world. The man returned, looked through the window and said:

"Oh, I'm not kicking at all. This is a world of improvement, and if I'm a year behind the times it's my fault, and I'm not saying a word. If shoving is better than phosphates, why, shoving it is."—Detroit Tribune.

A Wonder.

A number of military men in a Washington hotel were giving an account of an incident of the civil war. A quiet man who stood by at last said:

"Gentlemen, I happened to be there and might be able to refresh your memory as to what took place in reference to the event just narrated."

The hotel keeper said to him:

"Sir, what might have been your rank?"

"I was a private."

Next day the quiet man as he was about to depart asked for his bill.

"Not a cent, sir; not a cent," answered the proprietor. "You are the very first private I ever met."—New York Times.

The Evils of Divorce.

Wilfred and Elsie were quarreling over a costly doll. Wilfred had a good grip on the doll's leg, and Elsie held on to the china head with both hands. They pulled and quarreled simultaneously.

"Elsie," came mamma's voice from somewhere in the kitchen, "what's all that noise about?"

After a short pause Elsie replied: "Nothin', ma. We're only playin' divorce, an' Wilfred's fightin' for the custody of our doll."—Judge.

Brown—I only knew my wife six weeks before I married her.

Tomkins—That's nothing. I only knew mine six weeks after.—Sketch.

Flying Streak.

Gunner—So the rich De Bullions live up in that magnificent mansion?

Guyer—Yes, and they have a yellow streak in the family.

Gunner—You don't say! Where is it?

Guyer—Why, that was it that just swept by like a cyclone. Their racing automobile is painted yellow, you know.—Chicago News.

An Embarrassment.

"How do you get on with your titled son-in-law?"

"Pretty well," answered Mr. Cumrox, "only it's kind of embarrassing to have to address a man as 'your grace' when you are calling him down for spending too much money."—Washington Star.

An Antidote.

"Chawfer mistook his antifreeze automobile preparation for water and drank a glass of it."

"What effect did it have on him?"

"Why, he's lost all his taste for ice cream and frozen pudding."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

The Man With the Shovel.

With burdened look upon his mug he dons
His mitts, and then, with shovel firmly grasped
He makes grim onslaught on the snowy porch
In manner quite heroic. Frequently
He pauses, looks around to see if he's Observed from neighboring windows. If he is,
He straightway chesty gets for them he knows
They think he's all the [illegible] soft he goes.
"Oh, I'm the [illegible] every time!"
The porch [illegible] the snow-clad [illegible]
That [illegible] set or more
And thinks 'tis time for him to [illegible] car.
But he must finish off and [illegible]
And so he shovels on and on [illegible] chance
He also sometimes shovels off and off.
At last, when all is done and muscles ache,
Comes floating from the kitchen, "John be sure
To feed the furnace, for I think it's nearly out!"

MUNICIPALUNACY.

Edited by JOHN KENDRICK BANGS.

Professor Byron Scribble, the distinguished poet and president of the Higgsville Authors' club, has been placed in charge of the municipal gas plant at Higgsville, Ind. Professor Scribble has had no previous experience in the manufacture of gas, but there is no man in the Hoosier State who can handle various kinds of meters better than he, and under his administration it is hoped the produce will more closely resemble the divine afflatus than hitherto.

The estimated loss of $500 per diem upon the city owned Staten Island ferry in New York will be met not, as has been feared, by an increase of the tax levy, but by the printing of a sufficient number of tons of ferry bonds to be used as fuel as a substitute for coal, thereby saving vast sums of money and the whole bond issue being consumed without adding any future obligations, interest bearing or otherwise, to the city debt.

The city authorities of Glasgow admitted a loss last year of $60,000 on the operations of their gas plant. Mr. Sandy MacNab, the humorist of Troon, has written to the Glasgow Sunday American stating that these figures are more illuminating than the gas, which strikes the American mind as a pretty good joke for a Scotchman.

We hear on good authority that when the city of Chicago finally catches up to the operation of the street car system the substitution of hammocks and swinging chairs for straps is not seriously contemplated.

A sarcastic correspondent, who has read recently that the operating expenses of the Lakewood (O.) electric light plant show a cost of $129.50 per arc, writes to ask how this compares proportionately to the expense of running Noah's ark. The question is respectfully referred to the Union Theological seminary. We frankly confess that we do not know the answer.

People who live in glass houses should not throw stones. A Jamestown (N. Y.) man, who complained recently that the municipally owned electric lights of that town were frequently out all night was laughed out of court because he had to confess that he was often out all night himself.

One-fifth of the garbage of the city of New York is consumed daily in operating the electric lighting plant by which the Williamsburg bridge is illuminated, a mile and a half long, or, counting both roadways, three miles. This means that only 2 per cent of New York's 900 miles of street lighting could be provided for if all the garbage available were used for that purpose. If, therefore, as has been advocated, the public buildings and thoroughfares should be lighted by electricity secured through the burning of this commodity, it is surely up to the loyal citizens of New York to produce more garbage than they do at present. It is to be hoped that this hint will be sufficient to induce the taxpayers to act, for, if they do not, who knows how long it will be before the city finds itself at the mercy of an unscrupulous, privately owned garbage manufacturing company, organized for no other purpose than to put the small garbage producer out of business and to secure the emoluments which belong to and should therefore accrue to the benefit of the people themselves?

Awful British Telephone Service.

Commenting upon the recent sale of the Glasgow municipal telephone system to the British postoffice the Philadelphia Inquirer says:

"The people of Glasgow are entitled to commiseration, for it is a case of out of the frying pan into the fire. By those who have tried it words have been declared inadequate to describe the badness of the telephone service furnished by the British postoffice.

"Municipal ownership may be all right in principle, but private enterprise properly controlled for the public benefit usually beats it in practice."

Present Ills Bad Enough.

While the most sanguine of conservatives may, in their most hopeful moments or when smarting under the issues of either individualism or corporate audacity, feel an impulse to try the prescription of the municipal ownership doctors, yet a recollection of the examples of municipal employment with which the past is rife is quite enough to make one bear the ills we know about rather than open a Pandora's box of other ills, which once set free may never again be curbed or reboxed.—George W. Dithridge in New York Sun.

Want Their Money Back.

In 1903 Frankfort, N. Y., installed a municipal electric light plant at a cost of $6.50 for each inhabitant. The village trustees have now made a five year contract with the Utica Gas and Electric company because its price is less than the mere operating cost of the municipal plant.

Not Good Business.

Demagogues may say what they please, but government ownership, municipal or national, is wrong from the business man's point of view.—Jerome Jones.

When you live in or use property that is taxed you pay the taxes.

For Summer 1907

At Deer Park, Maryland, Main Line B. & O. R. R., to St. Louis, 2,500 Feet Above Tidewate, a Country Place of About 180 Acres.

"GLAMORGAN."

Thoroughly equipped as a farm and bounded by three county roads, insuring convenience and privacy. It is well adapted to public use, such as a Sanatorium or to private residences, five sites with beautiful views and appurtenant acres, being reached by its three miles of private pleasure drives through the woods.

The dwelling house was built from plans by Hewitt Bros., of Philadelphia. The plumbing is by Ogelsby, of the same city. It is in complete order, and is replete with the modern appliances of a gentleman's residence. It is within ten minutes' walk of the post-office and railroad station and within one mile of the Deer Park Hotel. Its general plan is as follows:

Wide porches surround three faces terminated, on a level, with billiard room.

I. FIRST FLOOR.—Parlor, hall with main stair case, library, dining room and lavatory.

II. BACK BUILDING.—Stair case to cellar, in which are furnace, gas machine (supplied by outside gasometer), wine closet, pantry (hot and cold water), back stairs to second story back building. Laundry—3 stationary tubs, hot and cold water in each; ironing stove, fire hose on reel and special boiler. Kitchen, with range, sink and all appliances. Back porch, ten feet from which is ice house practically inexhaustable in summer; servants' bath room, etc.

I. SECOND FLOOR.—Two communicating chambers, with bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; total, four chambers with three bath rooms.

II. BACK BUILDING 2nd FLOOR.—Four chambers, two closets, bath room with W. C. adjoining.

THIRD FLOOR.—Two chambers, two large lofts.

Every room has gas fixtures and eight rooms have open fire-places in addition to furnace register.

The water supply is unexceptionable, its every source being from springs rising within the confines of the place and all having passed analytical examination. Two tanks (each in contact with outside air) having a combined capacity of 14,500 gallons, a wind mill, a horse power and an overshot wheel supplying the motor. Three dams (likewise spring water) contribute the ice supply and two of them are stocked with fish. The outbuildings are a barn with stalls for six horses and eight carriages, with ample storage for hay, straw and oats and having a coachman's room, a tenant's house of five rooms, a large cow and sheep stable and numerous sheds, etc.

This property is without encumbrance and possession can be given in May, 1907.

THE B. & O. R. R. RAISES WAGES OF ITS EMPLOYES

Increase of $150,000 a Month and All But The Trainmen Benefited.

Under the plan adopted several weeks ago for adjusting the salaries of its employes, the Baltimore and Ohio railroad has increased its payroll about $150,000 a month, a change affecting a large percentage of its force of 50,000 persons. There has been no flat percentage of increase but the distribution of the increase, has been made generally throughout all the departments.

With 50,000 men at work and with an increased payroll of $150,000 a month, it would indicate that each one had received $3 a month more pay. This, however, is not the case. Many of this 50,000 received no increase at all. The pay of some was switched up to $25 or more a month, while others may not have gotten more than $1 or $2 more. It is impossible to say accurately the additional sum which will be available to those in Baltimore and vicinity.

The beneficiencies include clerks in the departments, yardmen, switchtenders—in fact, all except train hands. The average increase may be from $10 to $15 a month, so that out of the $150,000 additional on the entire payroll perhaps anywhere from $25,000 to $30,000 will be disbursed in Baltimore.

Early in the year the company adjusted the pay of its train hands, including conductors, brakemen, engineers and firemen. Therefore these men are not included in the present plan. Following the adjustment it was believed that other departments deserved recognition. It is said the directors took the matter up in January and authorized the executives to go ahead. Steps were at once taken to ascertain the duties performed. When this data was in hand recommendation for increase in worthy cases were made and were at once acted on. The investigations have necessarily been long drawn out owing to the extent of the system and the great amount of detail required in getting up satisfactory reports. The whole matter is now well in hand, however, and the additional pay is being disbursed.

Cannot Be Published.

Recently this office has been in receipt of a number of communications from various parts of the county to which the names of the writers were not affixed. ## CIRCUIT COURT LAST MONDAY.

The March Non-Jury Term Convened and Adjourned Same Day.

The March non-jury term of the Circuit Court for Garrett county was held on Monday of this week, Associate Judge Robert R. Henderson, of Cumberland, presiding.

The several dockets were called over and in a number of cases judgments against parties were entered.

A youth named Coffman, of Deer Park, who was convicted at a recent session of court of having entered the store of D. M. Shaffer at Deer Park and stealing therefrom articles to the value of a few dollars, but in view of extenuating circumstances Judge Henderson granting him a parole of two years, was before the court on the charge of having violated the terms of his parole Coffman was examined by the Court and admitted having been under the influence of liquor on the 13th inst., having come to Oakland in company with two other youths from Deer Park, and visited a number of saloons where Coffman alleged he and the others procured liquor and beer. In answer to inquiries propounded Coffman stated that the saloons of John Lee, C. A. Hesen, R. S. Jamison and Stephen Nally were visited in turn and that at the three places first named liquor had been procured, and at Lee's place pool had been played by himself and his companions. In accordance with Coffman's testimony warrants for the arrest of the parties against whom information had been made were placed in Sheriff Lee's hands and they were taken into custody by the officer but released upon filling bonds for their appearance at the June term of the Circuit Court.

After Coffman's statement to the Court Judge Henderson extended his parole but warned him that if he violated its terms the second time he would be sentenced to serve a term of imprisonment.

FATALLY HURT.

William Coghlan, of Piedmont, Struck by Train No. 1.

Mr. William Coghlan, aged 63 years, for the past thirty years a resident of Piedmont, W. Va., where during all that time he has been employed by the B. & O. railroad, was struck by passenger train No. 1, at Red Rock, below Piedmont, Sunday evening, and was so seriously injured that he died at the Hoffman hospital, Keyser, W. Va., shortly before midnight. Mr. Coghlan has recently been employed as watchman at Red Rock, and a man very well known and highly respected. His wife died about three months ago. He leaves two sons, Messrs. William Coghlan, of Oakland, telegraph operator, and Allen Coghlan, chief clerk to the Baltimore and Ohio railroad master mechanic, Cumberland.

THE REPUBLICANS OF MARYLAND TO MEET

Bring About an Organization as Required by New Party Constitution.

The Republican State Central Committee will meet in Baltimore on April 3, in compliance with the new constitution of the party adopted on December 21, 1905, which requires biennial meetings of the committee on the first Wednesday in April.

The main business to come before the committee will be to organize for the coming state campaign. A chairman will be elected and a secretary chosen to succeed the late John C. Simering. It is understood that Mr. John B. Hanna, the incumbent chairman, is willing to continue in this position, but will not make a contest for election. He was originally selected upon the recommendation of Mr. S. A. Williams when the latter was a candidate for governor. He has discharged his duties satisfactorily and with minimum friction among the several elements of the party. Because his acceptance to all the elements of the party it is believed that he will again be chosen.

The committee which drafted the new party constitution, in recommending the organization of the state committee on the first Wednesday of April in each alternate year, said:

The purpose of this change is to give better opportunity for effective and and successful work by having a greater length of time for the same, and in order that the organization of the committee and the work of the campaign may not be held back until the time required at which the party can now hold its state conventions.

It is possible that at the coming meeting of the committee a date may be fixed for holding the state convention to nominate candidates for governor, for comptroller, for attorney general, and for clerk of the Court of Appeals. It is also proposed to begin early the work of instructing voters how to mark accurately their ballots. In order to over come the obstacles put in the way of electing a Republican state ticket, the leaders in several counties are said to be willing to abandon nominations for minor local offices, so as to relieve the ticket of as many complications as possible.

It will be a coincidence that the state committee will meet on the day after the primaries in Baltimore for the nomination of local candidates. The opportunity will be seized to bring into harmony the elements in Baltimore now struggling for the nominations. The state leaders, who will attend the committee meeting will insist that the winners and losers shall bury the hatchet; that the losers line up behind the successful candidates, and that everything shall be done to bring Republican success at the state election.

Letter to D. E. Bolden & Co.

Oakland, Md.

Dear Sirs: You may like to know what you pay for the paint in a gallon of "paint," assuming that the pure-paint part of all "paints" to be alike; which it isn't; and worth $1.75 a gallon.

Of a paint adulterated 10 per cent., the pure-paint part brings $1.94 a gallon.

15 per cent. brings $2.06 a gallon.
25 " " 2.33 "
33⅓ " " 2.62 "
50 " " 3.50 "
75 " " 7.00 "

The average adulteration of paint in this country is about one-third; so, you see, the average price the American people are paying for paint is about $2.62 a gallon.

It is a game of wits. Adulterators are always too sharp for the bulk of consumers. People won't pay $1.75 a gallon for paint. So they pay $2.62 a gallon for paint and something that looks like paint mixed with it. (They pay the painter, besides, from $2 to $4 for painting those useless gallons.)

Why do they do it? They don't know Devoe.

Yours truly,
18 F. W. DEVOE & Co.

THE DEATH RECORD.

NEVIN YOUNKIN.

Nevin Younkin, a son of the late Cyrus Younkin, of Grantsville, Md., was kicked by a horse about two weeks ago, and on Monday morning last he died of his injuries. Deceased was about 16 years, and as the result of his accident his skull was fracture and one arm broken. The funeral took place on Tuesday, conducted by the M. E. paster at Grantsville.

BIDS FOR ERECTION OF NEW COURT HOUSE ASKED

The Commission Requires Bidders to Submit Proposals by April 18th.

The Court House Commission, having in charge the work of selecting plans and the letting of the contract for the erection of the proposed new Court House for Garrett county, was in session yesterday with Judge Henderson, chairman of the Commission, Senator W. McCulloh Brown, secretary, County Commissioners Stephen, Smith and Friend, Messrs. D. E. Offutt, J. M. Jarboe and Charles M. Miller, present.

Mr. J. Riley Gordon, architect, who drew the plans for the building, also was in attendance at the meeting of the Commission, when he submitted the complete drawings, showing the arrangement of the three floors of the building, the side and front elevations and detailed drawings of the basement.

Senator Brown, as secretary, has, been authorized by the Commission to receive bids for the erection of the building at his office in the Court House. All bidders are expected to file their bids on or before April 18th at noon, when they will be opend, in accordance with the advertisement printed elsewhere in this paper today.

Bidders are required to file a certified check in the sum of $2000 with their proposals and one to whom the contract is awarded must file a bond in the sum of $30,000 within ten days thereafter for the faithful performance of his contract.

Statistics of the Churches of the United States.

Professor H. K. Carroll, LL. D., who was in charge of the Government Census of Churches in 1890, and who is the most reliable church statistician we have, gives the following figures of the different denominations in the United States of America. These figures include all ministers, priests and communicants:

Adventists (6 bodies), 97,002; Baptist (14 boides), 5,178,730; Brethren (3 bodies), 4,412; Plymouth Brethren (4 bodies), 6,661, Catholic (9 bodies), 11,158,724; Apostolic Catholics, 1,546; Christadelphians, 1,377; Christian Connection, 102,945; Christian Catholic (Dowie), 40,104; Christian Scientists, 81,523; Christian Union, 17,701; Church of God (Winebrennarian), 8,212; Church of the New Jerusalem, 41,973; Communist Communistic Societies (6 bodies), 694,923; Congregationalists, 700,872; Disciples of Christ (Campbelites), 1,271,908; Dunkards (4 bodies), 124,435; Evangelical (5 bodies), 180,847; Friends (4 bodies), 120,218; Friends of the Temple, 334; German Evangelical Protestant, 20,100; German Evangelical Synod, 229,384; Jews (2 bodies), 143,301; Latter-Day Saints (2 bodies), 398,006; Lutherans (23 bodies), 1,967,305; Swedish Evangelical Mission Covenant, 46,345; Mennonites (12 bodies), 62,930; Methodist (17 bodies), 6,593,374, (2,904,261 of these are in the M. E. church); Moravians, 17,053: Presbyterians (12 bodies), 74,395, Protestant Episcopal (2 bodies), 851,950; Reformed (3 bodies), 424,703; Salvation Army, 32,275, United Brethren (2 bodies), 288,485; Spiritualists, 295,000; Unitarians, 71,544; Universalists, 56,551; Independent Congregations, 14,180.

In 1906 there were 44 denominations with 159,503 ministers and priests, 32,283,658 communicants with 207,707 churches in which they worship according to their own free will.

Professor Carroll says: "It should be understood that the figures standing for Catholic communicants are not the result of an actual count. The rules adopted by the prelates of that Church in making returns for the census of 1890 was to take eighty-five per oent of the 'population' and that it is not necessary to say to say that this method is not according to statistical science, as they are more or less guesses at the 'populanion.' Some years ago Dr. John Gilmary Shea, editor of Sadler's Catholic Directory, dropped the column of 'population' as untrustworthy, insisting that it was better to have nothing than to have guesses."

The Methodist Episcopal Church is the strongest Protestant body in the United States, or in the world, according to the latest statistics.

If the 32,630,868 church people of our country voted as they are supposed to pray, many other evils, as well as the rum evil, of our country would soon be annihilated.

INTERESTING MEETINGS

Are Being Held Nightly In St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran Church.

The series of special meetings announced in these columns last week to begin in St. Mark's Ev. Lutheran church in Oakland, have been well attended ever since the initial service on last Thursday night, when the pastor, Rev. E. Manges, delivered an eloquent sermon to an interested audience.

The meetings ever since Thursday evening have been of more than passing interest, the number attending each succeeding meeting being greater and the result has been an awakening of the members of the church to a higher appreciation of their duties both as christians and citizens.

Rev. J. B. Shoup, of Bittinger, preached a magnificent sermon last night to a large audience.

On Friday night Dr. William W. Davis, superintendent of the Mountain Lake Park Association, will deliver a lecture on the life of Dr. Martin Luther, the great Reformer. Dr. Davis has deliver this lecture in other parts of Maryland and also in the State of Pennsylvania to appreciative audiences and has received some very flattering press notices in both states.

Rev. Manges cordially extends a hearty invitation to all to attend all of the meetings in his church, especially that of Friday evening.

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Mrs. Virginia Pierce and family, for some time past residing at Rowlesburg, W. Va., have returned to the Park and will occupy the Pierce cottage on L street.

Dr. J. W. Laughlin and family will soon move from the Fallon cottage on H street to the Davis cottage on G street. The Fallon cottage will be occupied this season by Miss Jennie Murphy as a boarding house.

We understand that Mr. G. C. Hammond, one of our merchants, has leased the Chautauqua Hotel and will conduct that popular house this season. We wish "Clarence" success and feel sure that he will give satisfaction.

We are expecting a number of families much earlier in the season than usual.

Rev. Hart now occupies the Baumgartner cottage, where he will be prepared to entertain boarders this season.

Mrs. Bussell and daughter, of Parkersburg, have been in the T. E. Davis cottage on G street for some weeks. They are already prepared to entertain their friends.

Postmaster J. E. Chappell and Mr. G. J. Pool, both of Kitzmillerville, were in the city Saturday of last week, where the latter purchased a pool table which he will erect in his home town.

BUNCH OF ALLEGED THIEVES ARRESTED

Sheriff Lee Rounded Up Three Members of The Wilt Family Near Bond.

Tuesday night Sheriff A. L. Lee and Deputy Sheriff Henry May went to Bond where they arrested Bruce, Lewis and Cleveland Wilt upon a warrant charging them with having stolen from the station at Bond Junction a quantity of groceries which belonged to Jacob Pence, the goods having been shipped to Pence over the B. & O. to the Junction and there left to be transported over the Savage River road to Bond.

The theft of the goods is alleged to have taken place last December.

The State's officers brought the three men to Oakland yesterday morning and this morning they were given a hearing before Justice Gonder who held them for the action of the June term of the Circuit Court.

CARNATIONS ARE AN OLD FLOWER

They Were Cultivated in Shakespeare's Time.

A florist says that we pride ourselves nowadays on the size of our carnations, but the florists of 300 years ago grew carnations three or four inches across, as large as any that we see, and thought nothing of it.

"All through Spain, southern France and Italy the carnation is the favorite flower and has been for hundreds of years, but along the Mediterranean there are few glass houses, for in protected situations and on southern slopes of hills even delicate flowers grow outdoors all winter long and bloom as freely at Christmas as in July.

"The big carnations, however, were not grown in Spain or Italy, but in England outdoors during the summer time and before glass houses were known. They may have grown just as large carnation flowers in Spain as in England at that time, but in England there was a record made of the fact and also of the size, while in Spain there was not. Shakespeare mentions carnations gillyflowers, or July flowers, together as blooming at the same season, which shows that the carnation was then a summer flower, whereas in our greenhouses it is now a winter bloomer. How the florists of those days treated the plants to obtained blooms of such size nobody knows, for old time florists grew flowers instead of writing books about them. So all we know is that they had very large carnations in Queen Elizabeth's time without knowing how they were grown."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Woes and Drunkenness..

Ephraim occupied a fertile territory, stretching across the heart of Palestine from the Mediterranean to the Jordan. In the midst stood Samaria, the capital, on a commanding eminence. The tropical luxuriance of the valleys hung about it like the bacchanalian garland on the brow of the banqueter. And its exuberance was as evanescent; for its glorious beauty was a fading flower. Destruction was at hand.

The capital, court, and people were enslaved to drink. Under its subtle delusion they were in perfect ease. With the proverbial stupidity of the drunkard, they felt perfectly safe, trusting in the mountain fastness of Samaria. With the sense of justice blunted by the use of intoxicants, and their basest passion inflamed, they oppressed the poor and crushed the needy. With the insatiable thirst which the use of alcoholic liquors always begets, kept crying, "Bring, and let us drink"—the Samaritan equivalent to our modern Bacchanal, "Here's a health to you." (Amos vi, 1.)

But the judgments of God are abroad. The irresistible Assyrians, Shalmaneser, mighty and strong, is God's instrument of wrath. He looks upon Samaria like a peculiarly tempting morsel; like a fig ripe in June, so rare and succulent that one swallows it as soon as it is in his hand; does not even think of laying it aside to preserve it or eat at at his leisure. His coming will be like a tempest of hail, a destroying storm, a flood of waters; figures peculiarly impressive in that latitude, where in an hour the dryest water-course becomes an awful current. This prophecy had its literal fulfillment 721 B. C., in the ninth year of Hosea, king of Israel. The country was ravaged by the Assyrians under Shalmaneser, and Isreal deported in the cities of Assyria and Media. (2 Kings xviii, 9-12.)

The prophet now turns from Israel to Judah. He contrasts the imperishable crown and diadem, glorious and beautiful, rewards of piety on the brow of Judah, the righteous and faithful residue, with the fading garlands of voluptuous pleasure on the brow of drunken Ephraim. God shall help Judah's judges on the bench and her warriors at the gate. This has been aptly called a Messianic pendant to the foregoing picture of Samaria's fall.

But Judah, too, is not free from this degrading sin. Even her priests and prophets are infected with it. And the people will not endure the prophet's rebukes. Listen to their drunken scoffing: "Does Isaiah presume to instruct us? Does he take us to be just weaned, that he adopts such a childish way? Here and there, with no set order, and conning his words over, as if we were still in our primers,

"Tzav lat-zav, tzav lat-zav, Quv laquv, quv laquv."

Ewald says: "We must conceive the abrupt, intentionally short, reiterated, and almost childish words of verse ten, as spoken in mimicry, with a mocking motion of the head, and in a childish stammering tone."

The prophet rejoins: "Ah! if you will not let me teach you, then the Assyrians and Babylonians shall, and their foreign accent will seem more like stammering and twaddle than my instructions." If they had only hearkened to the prophet's voice, they might have found rest from warlike preparations, and that more blessed rest which comes from obedience to the Divine precepts.

But the Lord's word was offensive to them from its very simplicity. They rejected it; so, like a drunken man, the nation tottered and stumbled to its ruin.

Analysis and Key.

1. Tropical luxuriance of Ephraim.
   Exuberance evanescent—fading flowers.
2. Capital, court, populace enslaven to drink.
   Stupidity of the drunkard exemplified.
   Sense of security—poor oppressed.
3. Judgments against Israel.
   Shalmaneser on instrument.
   Samaria ripe to be devoured.
   A tempest of hail—prophecy fulfilled 721 B. C.
4. A Messianic Pendant.
   Under pictures of Samaria's fall.
   Faithful residue of Judah.
5. Judah not faultless.
   Prophet's accusation.
   Degrading sin of drunkenness.
6. The charge resented.
   Drunken scoffing.
7. Prophet's rejoinder.
   Foreign accent of invaders.
   More like stammering than prophet's repeated charges.

The Teacher's Lantern.

The Prophet Isaiah appears in a new role. He is par excellence the temperance reformer of his age. He is the model for every age. He is not intemperate in his attack upon intemperance. Yet for moral earnestness he is not surpassed.

* * * * *

Drunkenness is usually insolent. It was ribald and abusive toward the prophet. But this did deter him. He warded off the sneer with a terrible denunciation.

* * * * *

Canaan was the bridge between Syria and Egypt. The world-powers of that age coveted it. Possession of it was a strategic necessity. It could be used either as a thoroughfare or a buffer. But the Israelites might have held the country against all comers. Its mountainous character was a natural defense. Horses and chariots (the artillery of the ancients) could not be used there.

* * * * *

But drunkenness was the real foe both to the northern and southern kingdoms. It led to their overthrow. They were "overcome of wine" literally, wine-smitten. They were hit as with a hammer, stricken to earth. Israel never rose again, and Judah a mere shadow of former grandeur.

* * * * *

The luxurious refinement of the kingdom of Isreal and its crimson-clothed nobles as described by Amos, makes one think of the palaces and villas of Pompeii as they have been brought to light by extensive excavations—"summer and winter houses, ivory palaces, gardens, vineyards, fig-orchards, olive-yards, melody of viols, beds of ivory, fragrant ointments and wine by the bowlful" is the prophet's inventory. The cultivation of æsthetic effects for eye and ear and palate is not in itself reprehensible. But a halt must be called when the beneficent Giver is forgotten in the greedy enjoyment of the gift. And the proportion of life must be maintained. To lose that proportion, even in perfectly innocent things, is to be intemperate. Intemperance of any kind tends to lower the moral tone. Intemperance persisted in ends in total loss of moral tone. The Man becomes a Thing. This is in a sense the unforgivable sin. For the human is the temple of the Divine, and when the temple is ruined the Divine must make His exit.

* * * * *

In our day, as in Isaiah's, some priests and prophets err in vision through drink or other forms of intemperance. But discrimination must be made between the genuine and the professional priests and and prophets. There is a spurious officialism which counts for nothing in the cure of souls.

* * * * *

There are ninety texts in the Old Testament which refer to the sin of drunkenness, and many more in the New Testament. The Bible is a red lantern swung across the path of youth.

* * * * *

Every one is under the highest moral obligation to cast the full weight of his influence everywhere and always against this evil.

TO BE BUISY SEASON AT MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Association Will Be a Notable Event.

The coming season of the Mountain Lake Park Association, at Mountain Lake Park, Md., will be marked by the celebration of the twenty-fifth successful year of the organization. An appropriate program is being arranged. Governor Warfield, Senator Whyte, Congressman Geo. A. Pearre, Col. Thomas B. Davis and other distinguished speakers will take part. Among the Baltimoreans who will be present are Dr. C. W. Baldwin, the president of the association; Judge Thomas Ireland Elliott, Bishop L. B. Wilson and Rev. Dr. John W. Goucher, of the Women's College. The celebration will be held from July 30 to August 1.

Beginning August 5, the Mountain Lake Park Chautauqua will continue until August 20. This Chautauqua is similar to that of Winona Lake, N. Y. The program is extensive, and includes many prominent lecturers and educators of the East and South. About 25 college presidents have accepted positions on the advisory board of the association and will engage actively in the work of the coming assembly. Dr. Ira E. Remsen, of Johns Hopkins University, and Dr. Goucher, of the Women's College, will probably deliver addresses on subjects of interest. One of the features will be a debate on "Government Ownership and Trusts" between W. M. Mills and J. R. Barnhill. Arrangements are being made for addresses by Senator Benjamin Tillman and Commander Peary, who will probably tell of his search for the Pole. Adequate entertainments have been arranged to take place in the large amphitheatre, which has a seating capacity of 5,500.

The season opens June 21 with the student conference and will be in session until June 30. The mornings will be devoted to Bible study and the afternoons to recreation under the directions. Evenings will be given to the platform speakers, who include some of the prominent theologians of the day.

The Women's Foreign Missionary Society's anniversary will be celebrated July 19 to 21. Bishop Luther B. Wilson, of Baltimore, will preside. Other assemblies will be the Home Missionary and Church Extension Society Conference, at which Dr. J. M. King, of Philadelphia, will preside, and the anniversary of the Women's Home Missionary Society, of which Mrs. Wesley Davis, of Wilkinsburg, Pa., is president. The National Prohibition Conference, which is being arranged by Superintendent William W. Davis, of the Mountain Lake Park Association and Mr. Charles R. Jones, chairman of the Prohibition party, will also be held there. The Interdenominational Conference of City workers will be attended by representative men from many leading churches east of the Mississippi.

Dr. William W. Davis of Baltimore is the superintendent of the association and is at present delivering speeches in churches and at men's meetings in the eastern part of the country. He will address a men's meeting at Carlisle, Pa., Sunday. Later he will go to West Virginia.

The territory owned by the association consists of about 800 acres. It has a fine situation and has a resident population of 2,500. During the Chautauqua sessions fully 2,500 visitors are present, who, with the residents, make times lively.—Baltimore Sun.

BLAZING THE WAY IN ROAD BUILDING IN MARYLAND.

State Engineer Crosby Tells Of It At Pittsburg Convention.

A paper on "Blazing the Way in Maryland," by Walter W. Crosby, Highway Engineer of this State, was a feature of Wednesday session of the American Roadmakers' Convention in Pittsburg.

After telling of the legislative provision of the Geological Survey in 1896, and of the steps leading up to the Shoemaker law, Mr. Crosby said:

"State aid began in 1904 by the passage of an act providing additional powers and duties for the Geological Survey. Under this act an appropriation of $200,000 annually is placed at the disposal of those counties which will complete in any year, under the provisions of the act, such a mileage of modern roads acceptable to the State as they are willing to pay half the cost of.

"The counties apply to the Geological Survey for aid on a specific road. The State makes the surveys and plans, and draws the specifications. These are submitted to the county for its approval. Sometimes the county refuses to approve even the minimum requirements of the State, and in that case no further State aid is given. These cases, I am glad to say, are growing rapidly fewer. In some other cases the county desire to incur even greater expense than the interest of the State as a whole seem to justify. In such cases the additional work is done at the expense of the county alone.

"We have been hindered in this work both in 1905 and 1906 by an unusual amount of rainy weather during those seasons when ordinarily the most work on the roads is done. To date, however, we have completed 40 miles of modern road at a cost, on an average, of less than $6,000 a mile, and unfinished contracts are extant for 16 miles more. It is felt a start has been made. Applications are on file for 175 miles additional. As soon as the first mile was actually completed and an object lesson was available the usual result—the cry for 'more'—followed.

"We are up against only two difficult propositions at this time. One, the unwillingness of the officials of one or two counties to co-operate with the State, possibly on account of the withdrawal from their absolute control of a comparatively large proportion of the road fund of the county; and, second, the lack of cash funds in some counties. We can, I am sure, leave both these situations to the people of the respective counties to deal with successfully. Already some counties have issued bonds for the purpose of securing immediately State aid and improved roads. Others are preparing to secure the authority from the General Assembly next winter. The present state of the situation in Maryland seems to us, under all the circumstances, most promising.

"We have all sorts of conditions to meet in actual construction. Possibly they are more varied than in most States. We have the sand and clays of the Eastern Shore, the noncementing gravels of Southern Maryland and the rocks and clays of the western portion of the State. The 'lay' of the land varies from horizontal to vertical. The climate is noted for its variety and its agility in changing. In short conditions throughout the State are diverse and, taken as a whole, probably less favorable to easy constructing of permanent roads than in many other parts of the country. Generally our roads not only do not get a respite from wear during the winter, but on the contrary the demands on them are far more severe and constant during that season, when natural conditions are most unfavorable for successful resistance to those demands.

"Of the 40 miles of completed road, 31 miles have been of 6-inch trap rock or limestone macadam; 4½ miles of gravel first course, with limestome surface, and 4½ miles of oystershell road.

"The average cost per mile of all of these have been $6,000 exclusive of supervision, but, of course, including the grading, culvert and bridge work. The width of the macadam is usually 12 feet, in some cases 14, and on the shell roads 10. The average cost a square yard of the stone or stone-gravel-macadam alone has been 62 cents; of the shell macadam alone, 48¼ cents, or $4,374 and $2,548 a mile, respectively.

"All culverts and bridges under 40-foot spans have been built of concrete or virified clay, and cast iron pipe used; no wood boxes nor wooden floors except on two long steel bridges. No grades have been left more than 8 per cent., and but one or two as high as that. We require practically the same results as to shape, rolling, flushing, etc., as New Jersey, Connecticut and Massachusetts.

"Several years ago the commission investigated the cost of the old turnpikes of the State. There are about 500 miles of these, in all sorts of condition—some bad and abandoned, others comparing very favorably with any in the country. It was found difficult to secure accurate figures in all cases, but the result of the investigation showed that the average cost of these pikes had been about $8,000 a mile. These figures must be understood as prevailing at a time when not only were labor and materials much cheaper than at present, but also frequently free contributions of both were made by neighbors in order to secure the construction of such roads in any locality.

"Some opposition to State aid to county roadbuilding has presented itself in those sections where, perhaps, the turnpikes now are in the best condition and most flourishing. One or two counties are quite efficiently traversed by toll roads and the opposition has expressed itself against the construction by the State and county of such roads as will compete with these existing enterprises.

"Such opposition is historical and must, of couase, be anticipated. However, I believe that the day of toll roads in Maryland is past, and that the State and the counties should and will gradually take over the existing pikes and throw them open to the public.

"In the meantime, I suggest that the counties, with the assistance of the State, improve the main feeders of the pikes and such other main roads as are needed to meet the public demands not satisfied by the pikes themselves. The general demands of the public will be in this way most quickly and satisfactorily met, met, and the turnpikes not only will not be injured, but their value actually increased to their owners as well as to the general public. If the entrance and exits to the pikes leading to and from railroad stations, etc., were put in first-class condition, then the questions of abolishing the tolls would logically follow immediately.

"It is believed that the form of State aid in Maryland—not only best fitting conditions with us, where no township exist and strong county organization, pride and feeling permeate all political and social questions—is most valuable in its educational features. The object lessons of the results on the roads themselves; the information imparted to even the casual observer in the different localities by the methods of the contractor during construction, to say nothing of that carried directly home to the county officials and workmen where they themselves carry out the work, and no requirements on the county roadworkers for the proper maintenance under the supervision of the trained employes of the State, cannot fail to be most effective in teaching the various County Commissioners, supervisors, foremen and workmen, how to perform properly the construction and repair of roads in general, and must have its influence toward improving the condition of all the other roads in the State, and lead to their material and betterment.

"In Massachusetts in 10 years the Stateaided roads constructed have amounted to approximately 600 miles, and within the same time the towns, from the force of the example set them, have completed more than an equal amount of similar roads.

"We cannot believe that, resources considered, in an equal period the people of even Massachussetts will be found to be, by the results evident, any more intelligent or progressive for good roads than are the people of Maryland."

POINTS OF DIFFERENCE.

Public and Private Methods Contrasted—Organization vs. Aggregation.

One controlling economic reason for opposing public ownership is that every individual in society prospers just in proportion as industry gets the best there is in human capability. On the other hand, government control and direction never get and in the nature of things never can get all there is or the best there is in human capability.

Now the government may [illegible] with private enterprise in getting capable men, but it has not thus far shown anything of the capacity of private enterprise to assign the right man always to the right place. The agency which in private enterprise succeeds so generally in eventually landing in the right place the right man is not simply good intention or mere intelligence, but the intelligence and intention which constantly study the enterprise in hand, which make it the one affair in life, constantly thought of and planned for—an intelligence and intention, too, which are themselves as nearly as possible permanent. That kind of seeking out and watchfulness few government departments possess. The men in charge of government departments may be intelligent and well intentioned, but they are in today and out tomorrow. The thing under them is not their child. They never, as a matter of fact, get their hands and their minds fully into the work.

Nor will civil service change this. Civil service examinations may secure capable men, but no civil service examination can assign the right man to the right place, can pick out of the thousand capable men just the kind of capability that is fitted to this place and just the kind that is fitted to that. Indeed, between government control and private control the difference in that respect is almost the exact difference between what we call true organization and what is the merest aggregation, for in private enterprise each man has come by a process of attrition to the place he is best fitted to fill, while in government employment each man is dropped into his place irrespective of special fitness and under civil service is riveted there.—Hon. Peter S. Grosscup in American Magazine.

LITTLE INDIVIDUALISM THERE.

Why Public Ownership Is Popular In European Countries.

In Europe governments are largely paternal because of the lack of individualism. The very helplessness of the people fosters and necessitates paternalism. That is why national and municipal governments operate public utilities. Under a monarchy, for that reason, the tendency of the people is naturally toward socialism.

The phenomenal growth and prosperity of the United States have been attained without either paternalism or socialism. Compare the condition of the people here, their better living, their comfort and happiness, with the condition of the people of the nations of Europe, and there is only one conclusion—that is that for us individualism is the state policy, and we do not have to borrow the institutions of foreign nations created by a need from which we are free. It is just because of our individualism that socialistic institutions and co-operative schemes never prosper here.—Newark (N. J.) Advertiser.

Officials Already Overloaded.

A third general objection to government agency rests on the principle of the division of labor. Every additional function undertaken by the government is a fresh occupation imposed on a body already overcharged with duties. A natural consequence is that most things are ill done, much not done at all, because the government is not able to do it without delays which are fatal to its purpose; that the more troublesome and less showy of the functions undertaken are postponed and neglected, and an excuse is always ready for the neglect, while the heads of the administration have their minds so fully taken up with official detail, in however perfunctory a manner superintended, that they have no time or thought to spare for the great interests of the state and the preparation of enlarged measures of sound improvement.—John Stuart Mill.

A Trade Union Inconsistency.

One of the anomalies of trades unionism is the demand for "closed shops" and the advocacy of municipal ownership when it is inevitable that every industry transferred from private to public ownership will become an "open shop." In public employment all conditions and wages of labor must be determined by laws and ordinances. No law excluding nonunion men from public employment can stand the test of its constitutionality.—Public Policy.

Use Anesthetics In Both Cases.

Guner—In surgery they can restore a person's skin by grafting.

Guyer—What a big differece between surgery and politics!

Gunner—What is the difference?

Guyer—Why, in politics they skin people by grafting.—Chicago Daily News.

Unwise Under Present Conditions.

Until we remove the political influence that tends toward corruption and extravagance I believe that municipal ownership would be unwise.—Professor Sedgwick.

Incapability of City Government.

I am opposed to municipal ownership because our city governments have not shown as yet any capacity for properly conducting their business.—Major Henry L. Higginson.

SUCCESS DEMANDS SACRIFICES.

There are many people who would like to do some splendid thing in the world, something which would be a real credit to their ability, something worth while but for the terrible price put upon it. It makes them sick at heart to think of all the delightful things they would like to do which they must put aside—the sacrifices they must make in order to do these things. They have the desire, but they haven't the stamina, the grit or determination to make the necessary sacrifice—to say no to the multitude of things which tempt them from their aim.

"Why is it," they ask, "that such a terrible price is put upon all the great prizes of life? Why should it be necessary to set aside the thousand and one pleasant things that allure us by the way? Why shouldn't we be able to take them all in—always play when we feel like it, do the pleasantest thing, the most attractive thing, as we go along, and still be able to achieve something worth while?"

Think what it means to have reached middle life or later and to feel that one has constantly sacrificed the greater for the less, that which is worth while for that which is pleasant and easy! The trouble with making a business or a profession of following the easy, the pleasant, the desirable things is that we never get any where in the process. We do not grow except as we do these thing for recreation, necessary change and rest. When we make a business of pleasure the whole man deteriorates, because he was made for work, was made to achieve something worth while, not to spend his life in pleasure hunting. The moment we make a business of pleasure, the pleasure loses it zest, its financial sweetness, and the man begins to retrograde.

We must do the thing that is indicated in the blood, that is stamped in our very constitution, or we must pay the penalty in going backward. We can not advance unless we obey the laws of growth and advancement. Many of us let the lesser crowd out the greater. We have not the stamina to sacrifice present comforts and pleasure the pay the price for the permanent and the more enduring. We would rather have the froth of pleasure, as we go along than the clear wine of that which endures.

The great failure army to-day is full of people who wanted to succeed, to do something really worth while, but who were victims of the pleasures of the moment. They could not forego the comfort, the ease, could not make the little sacrifices of their pleasure, as they went along, in order to do that which would give them the more enduring, the stable achievement. They thought they must have their pleasure as they went along. The could not make the sacrifices for that which endures, for that which is worth while.

---

The weekly country paper has as definite an excuse for being in the world as can be furnished by the city dailies. Such a publication is not only a business guide, but is a pulpit of morals; it is a kind of a public rostrum where the affairs of the state are considered; it is a supervisor of streets and roads; it is a social friend, a promoter of friendship and good will. Edited by a broad and just man, such a publication so treats the different sects that they realize their brotherhood and become in reality what they are pictured in print. The town weekly dare not be Presbyterian, or Methodist or Baptist, but it must select the valuable in each church, and thus it becomes the harmonizer of discord. It binds those whom theology would often separate. Even the so-called small matters of a village or incorporate town are small only to those whose hearts are too full of personal interest. It is very important if some school boy reads a good essay, or speaks well a piece, or sings well a song, or stands high in the class room, that kind of mention should be made publicly of such success, for more young minds are injured by the want of cheering words than are made vain by an excess of such praise.

MATTERS EDUCATIONAL.

Column Conducted By The Garrett County Teachers' Association.

With this issue the column devoted to educational matters will be discontinued. The schools will close in a few weeks and it is thought that this is the proper time to bring it to a close. Furthermore, the judges will require some time in which to pass upon the merits of the several articles which have been sent in, so that the proper award of the prize which has been offered may be made. The judges will be instructed to make the award upon the terms upon which the prize was announced, that is, as going "to the person who contributes an article which contains the most practical suggestions for the local schools of the county, suggestions which will go to make better and and more thorough the pedagogical work of our schools." These are the words which were used in the original announcement published December 27th. As there have been a large number of contributions submitted which will come under this requirement, the judges will have no easy task in deciding which one contains the most practical suggestions for the local schools. The award will be announced in the local press as soon as the judges make their decision known, which is thought will be reached within a week or so.

There have been many things said which were very sharp and others which were very dull; however, both sharp and dull things are needed in this life of ours in order to make it progressive. For the hoe is as useful as the razor. We need both. So in this column all sorts of suggestions and ideas have been advanced. However, if there has been one teacher who has received inspiration or one parent who has had pointed out to him or her their part in the school system, then the work and the venture has been a grand success.

The President of the Teachers' Association thanks all of those who have contributed to the column and who have from time to time sent in ideas and suggestions. And in the name of the teachers of the county, and for the Teachers' Association, the president thanks most heartily the newspapers of Oakland for their hearty cooperation in giving so much space and ideas which have greatly increased the usefulness of the publications which have appeared each week.

Two contributions were received which were not published. One was on Grammer and another on Methods. Both of these will be given to the judges and will be included in the number eligible for the prize. The former one was not published because it was received too late.

F. E. RATHBUN,
President Teachers' Association.

The articles in the series which have been published in the local papers during the past few weeks have been written by teachers. So it is thought that the following contribution will have an added attractiveness in that it does not come from a school teacher but from a minister. "At the invitation of the president of the Teachers' Association of this county, Rev. John A. McClelland, pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Oakland, has contributed the following article containing a few thoughts about educational matters:

"It has been with pleasure and profit that I have perused the columns of Oakland papers given to educational matters. The strength and range of the topics discussed gives me greater respect than ever for and shows what kind of stuff the average Garrett County teacher is made of. The contributions, relative to "Immoral Symbols" and "Who is the Back-bone of the Schools?—the Parents," deserves special mention. After reading these splendid papers, I could not but feel sorry for these teachers; how they are handicapped in putting into practice their fine ideals. "In the first place they are hindere by antiquated and inadequated school laws; and in the second place by the lack of chance to impart knowledge to those to who may desire to come for instruction. Often as I go down the street and see the number of boys and girls of school age who are wandering about at will, I think of the condition of affairs in Israel, when there was neither king nor judge. "Every man did that which was right in his own sight." To think of a state like Maryland, with a county like Garrett, with no compulsory school law! In other words, we are a Twentieth Century State with a Fifteenth Century school law.

"Again, when you think of our boasted wealth, and remember that we have the record-breaking school term of seven and a half months, it makes our educational pride drops to zero. With such a short term, is it any wonder that so few men and women make teaching their life work? As long as this condition of affairs exists, teaching will only be made a stepping stone to something better. There is no incentive in preparing for a profession at which one may work only seven and a half months out of twelve. Who can blame a teacher for not staying with a job like this?

"Let us be fair with these teachers and they will give us good service.

JOHN A. MBCLELLAND

THE BAD BOY, THEN AND NOW.

The following article is clipped from the Baltimore "Sun," and is published here with the purpose of giving the teachers and parents of Garrett County a view of the way in which corporal punishment of pupils is being considered by modern educators in the metropolis of our State. It is as follows.

"The 'new education' has worked a great change in the methods of 'dealing with' children. Formerly the bold, bad boy who possessed sufficient criminal instinct to whisper when the teacher turned her back was sent out to the principal and ten big, green, tough switches were worn to a frazzle over his coat tails. Following this the boy contrived to create disorder by the most ingenious methods, such as scattering match heads over the floor, putting red pepper in lunches, attaching pins to the bottom of chairs and doing other playful things. When caught he was beaten again, and perhaps his parents were instructed to give him another sound thrashing when he wended his way cheerfully home in the evening hoping surcease of sorrow.

"Nowadays the boy is ruled by kindness. He is assured that he is not a vagabond deserving of raw hides and hickory, but a fine young fellow with the making of a fine man. If he happens to speak to his desk mate he is not pictured as a criminal, but he is allowed to speak now and then if he feels like it. The teacher keeps order by interesting the pupils in their work rather than by threatening them with a thrashing when the letting-out hour rolls around.

"The boy who is really incorrigible is placed in the truant school. (In rural schools they are sent home to be corrected by their parents; and are kept there until it is felt sure that he will behave in the school.) Ten chances to one he will turn out all right when he is convinced that those who have authority over him are not trying to persecute, but are trying in every way possible to help and encourage him. Kindness is the key-note of the 'new education's' discipline. Fear was the key-note of the authority of the old."

The following contribution has been received for publication in the series:

THE REAL TEACHING.

Teaching is character building. Character is essentially a product of education and must tend toward perfection. If the standard of education be wrong, the character will be defective; but if the standard be ideal the result will be a perfect character. Character stations the individual in life and decides his fate for eternity. The several vocations in life are supposed to be occupied by persons of general fitness, and the destinies in the great beyond shall be inhabited by characters which have been developed and adopted on this side of the grave.

"There is a vast difference between reputation and character." "Reputation is what people think of us, and character is what God knows of us." The good name that is "rather to be chosen than great riches" means self-respect and "a conscience void of offense toward God and man." If these are in proper relation, this good name means more than reputation: it is character in the fullness of purity, and lifts the soul of the possessor into the realm of genuine existence. Herein is the field of the true educator, whether in the home or in the school or in the common walks of life.

We as teachers must awake to the awful responsibility of example! For as we hold before the children our ideas and ideals, they drink in, though unconsciously, our methods, our spirits, and our characters, reveal us in their own lives to their weal or woe. We should so impress the opening bud that in its development it will unfold the traits of gentleness, industry, truthfulness, the spirit of self-denial, and dutiful obedience to authority. And these will be worth far more to the child than to know how to "add fractions," "name the parts of speech," "find the value of x," ect. Yet the latter are showered upon us as a mighty flood from every quarter, while the former is sadly neglected in our pedagogical instructions from Alpha to Omega. Not that we should eliminated the branches to be studied, but that we should value principal and character more.

I would rather that a child of mine should have deeply fixed in his mind the principles of right and righteousness and know but little in books, than for him to know the entire school curriculum and along with it have his moral character so dwarfed as to make him untruthful, dishonest, and profane.

There is such a thing as teaching children to be truthful, upright and respectful to authority. Then should we not learn the art? We believe if these fundamentals of a child's education were first well-grounded, "all things else would be easily added." A proper degree of self-respect will always keep one's "tongue from evil and his lips from speaking guile," and in no case would there be so many ugly, foul symbols of immorality which are today on exhibition about so many school premises.

We should teach the pupils to stand well with their fellows, and not to sacrifice principle and thus offend the Divine mind to gratify the changing whims of a companion.

We cannot always please man, but no character so complete which does not have genuine self-respect and God's approval upon the possessor's life. True, pure character is the diamond that cuts every other stone, and marks the way of success to the boy and the girl in this life and a hundred fold more in the life to come. Let us therefore so teach and impress the child that it will build a temple of character whose summit shall pierce the bright, blue sky of liberty, justice and piety, while its base rests upon the solid granite of principles which we have taught to it in early life. Children thus trained and having grown into manhood and womanhood, will look into the golden urn of experience and behold the blossoming rose of Sharon as it sheds an aroma of joy over a sweet life, and see the unfolding white lily pointing to a pure crown of a happy reward.

THIS IS EDUCATION!

Mr. John H. Stark, of near Bittinger, was in Oakland Monday.

Mr. G. Semmes Hamill was in Baltimore a day or two last week.

Mr. D. E. Offutt, Jr., spent last Friday in Cumberland on business.

Mr. and Mrs. M R. Hamill had as their guest on Monday Mr. J. T. Sigler, of Wellman, Iowa.

Mr. J. A. DeBerry, of near Deer Park, was a business visitor to Oakland on last Saturday last.

Mr. Joseph Ash, of near McHenry, was in Oakland last Saturday and made this office a brief visit.

Mr. H. L. Daugherty returned from a week's visit to Pittsburg and vicinity on last Friday afternoon.

Mr. William Wilt, of near Swanton, was in Oakland Monday on business before the Board of County Commissioners.

Merchant E. A. Weimer went to Baltimore last night to purchase his spring stock of goods. He will return to Oakland on Friday.

The Board of County Commissioners, in session at the Court House this week, engaged in transacting routine business, adjourned yesterday afternoon.

Mr. and Mrs. George Hocking, of Myersdale, Pa., who were the guests of their daughter, Mrs. W. A. Sturgiss in Oakland for a few days, returned to their home on Monday morning.

Rev. J. A. McClelland spent last Friday at Keyser, West Va., where he went to visit the child of one of his Terra Alta parishioners, who is a patient in the hospital in that town.

Mr. Charles S. May, recently of Mountaiu Lake Park, but now a resident of Hagerstown and traveling out of Baltimore for a wholesale dry goods firm, was in Oaklond a number of days last week calling upon the merchants here.

Miss Alice Kepner, who visited Washington, Baltimore and Cumberland for the past few weeks, returned to her home in Oakland on last Saturday afternoon, accompanied by her sister, Mrs. Alvin Getty, of Cumberland, who will remain here as the guest of her parents for a short time.

Mrs. D. E. Offutt went to Baltimore last Thursday morning to visit her daughter Miss Nell, who is still a patient in one of the hospitals of that city. Miss Offutt's condition is slowly improving and her many friends here hope for her speedy restoration to health and her return to Oakland.

Mr. Byrne Hamill left Oakland yesterday morning for Chambersburg, Pa., where he will take a position with the Cumberland Valley Railroad Company an an engineer corps which will be sent into territory to be opened by that company in the near future.

With the opening of spring those who patronize our merchants will find better stocks to select from than were ever shown in this place. Our business men have been making a study of the wants of this community and they will have what you are looking for in stock. Give them a chance on everything you purchase this season.

It has become so much the custom to send keepsakes and remembrances to one's friends on holidays that one's purse is agape almost all the year round. This Easter the shopkeepers have been most considerate, and "prices for all purses" is the rule in more than one shop that makes a specialty of appropriate holiday gifts.

Postmaster-Merchant S. F. Cuppett, of Elder Hill, was a business visitor to Oakland on Monday when he called to see THE REPUBLICAN, leaving a nice order with us for some of our unsurpassed printed stationery. Mr. Cuppett seldom gets to Oakland and when he comes it is usually strictly a business visit, which was the case Monday.

Mrs. Herman Creutzburg went to Piedmont on Tuesday where she will remain an indefinite period as the guest of friends. Mr. Creutzburg has arrived at Pocatello, Idaho, where he advises his friends here, he found his mining interests in excellent condition and will at once begin the development of a new opening now being made in the paying quartz of the claims in which he has a large interest.

Prof. S. C. Smith, who conducted a music store in Oakland for a number of years, removing to Morgantown from here three years ago, where he is engaged as the representative of a firm of piano manufacturers, was in Oakland Tuesday on business. His wife recently underwent a severe surgical operation in a Pittsburg (Pa.) hospital, returning to her home about two weeks ago, improved to some extent as a result of the operation.

The Republican for Job Printing.

Here is a tangle. An old man of fifty and a young man of twenty-eight, both widowers. The young man has a stepdaughter thirty-eight years old, that he marries to the older gentleman, and in return takes the old man's daughter for a wife. Now what relation are those four people to one another.

Ages pass, but each returning Easter brings again its lessons of sacrifice, of unselfishness and of great love for humanity. Great snowy banks of lilies, emblems of purity, are offered in remembrance of the greatest self-abnegations in the history of the world. In vast cathedral and modest chapel vibrates majestic music of praise for that most wonderful resurrection, upon which is based the faith of the mighiest people of the earth.

And it came to pass that after he had advertised his goods, there came unto him great multitudes from all the regions round about and did buy of him. And when his competitors saw it they marveled among themselves, saying: "How be it that this man is busy while we loaf idly about our doors?" And he spake unto them: "In this fast age of push and rustle it is easier for a camel to enter the eye of a needle than for a man to flourish with out advertising."

Mr. John T. Harvey, one of our substantial friends from over Kitzmillerville-way, was in the city yesterday on business when he made this office a brief visit. Mr. Harvey reports the damage to roads and bridges between his home and Oakland, as a result of the terrific rain storm which passed over this section of the country Tuesday night, as being extremely heavy and that many days must elapse before the roads are in condition to travel by any other means than horseback or walking.

Dr. G. W. Slick, ex-Surgeon-General of Thoburn Post, G. A. R., now of Grantsville, was here several days this week. He treated some former patients and was treated in several instances by the latter, both sides feeling better immediately after treatment. Dr. Slick speaks well of Grantsville, the National Pike beyond "the wedge," and of Livengood. In fact, the doctor reciprocates friendly feeling, and would have a good word for his enemies, should he ever find out he has any.—Frostburg Journal.

The Board of County Commissioners sold at public auction on Monday the old Corrigan house, located on the lot which is to be used a site for the proposed new court house, to Mr. Roy Winters for the sum of $51. There a number of bidders. The house is one of the old landmarks of this part of the country, having been erected many years ago, being used successsively as a hotel, private residence, and latterly as the home of Mr. John Menhorn and the office of Justice A. S. Teats. By the terms of the sale Mr. Winters must remove the building within a specific time.

Henry Swauger purchased on Tuesday last the old John Wegman homestead in Grantsville, Md. He intends to pull down the old house, which is one of the oldest landmarks in Grantsville, Md., and erect two new houses on the property. Mr. Wegman, the former owner of the aforesaid estate, for many years conducted a store and a country tannery at Grantsville, and his tannery was one of the last country tanneries in that locality to go out of business as a result of the gigantic city concerns that made country tanning unprofitable. The old Wegman estate was purchased from ex-Sheriff Chas. Wegman, trustee, for for a consideration of $575.

There is no reasonable excuse for any man to live in a town if he doesn't like it, If you have no word of commendation to say for your town, its institutions or people, emigrate. You won't stop the town clock by going away. The church bells will have the same musical ring, the little dogs will play just as well and the pure air, bright sunshine and sparkling water will have the same health-giving properties. Speak a good word for your neighbor, if you can; if you cannot, don't everlastingly enlarge on their faults. If you have become thoroughly disgruntled move away; go some where where things will suit you.

YOUGH RIVER OIL AND GAS COMPANY

Nearly The Entire Capital Stock Has Been Subscribed by Local People.

Nearly the total capital stock of the Yough River Oil and Gas Company, which was chartered several months ago by local people for the purpose of boring for oil and gas, has been subscribed, about two hundred shares yet remaining unsold. The remaining shares will probably be taken by people who have already purchased stock.

Yesterday about a thousand dollars worth of the stock was disposed of to persons residing in Oakland and Mountain Lake Park. Within the next week it is confidently believed that the books will be closed and no more shares disposed of.

Much of the success of the undertaking so far is attributed to the untiring labor of Mr. Chauncey Kimmell, vice president af the corporation.

MRS. GRACE McGOWAN COOKE DEAD

Struck by Train.

Barney Durnan, who first came to Oakland a number of years ago with Stephen F. Herr, then proprietor of the Schley Hotel, was struck by a train in the cut between Second street and the water station in Oakland on last Saturday night and badly injured. He was taken to the hospital ward in the County Jail where he was attended by Dr. McComas. Barney's head was badly battered and for a number of days he lay in a camatose condition. This morning he is somewhat improved and he will probably recover.

TRUSTEE'S SALE

OF VALUABLE

Timber Lands

Near Mt. Lake Park, Md.

By virtue of a decree of the Circuit Court for Garrett county, in Equity, passed in a cause No. 1429 on the docket of said court, wherein Roberdeau Annan and others are plaintiffs and Roger Perry and others are defendants, the undersigned trustee will on the 5th day of April, 1907,

FRIDAY,

in front of the Court Hsuse in the town of Oakland, at the hour of 2 o'clock P. M., of said day, offer at public auction to the highest bidder all the following Military Lots and parts of lots situated about two miles south of Loch Lynn, in Garrett county, to-wit:

Military Lots Nos. 890, 895, 892, 978, 23 acres of Lot No. 979 and 28 acres of Lot No. 906, containing Two Hundred and Fifty-Six Acres, more or less, and being the same land awarded to the late Robert M. Perry in the sub-division of Lot No. 2, in the return of the Commissioners filed in No. 1364 Equity, and recorded in Judgment Record No. 14, folio 75, &c., one of the Judgment Records of Allegany county; excepting Military Lots Nos. 974, 975, 922, 920, 907 and 905, which last mentioned were also included in said award and return, but which said last mentioned lots were conveyed away by the said Robert M. Perry during his lifetime and at his death by his last will and testament.

Said land is covered by valuable Oak Timber and is said to be good Farming Land independent of the Timber.

TERMS OF SALE—As prescribed by the decree: One-third of the purchase money in cash on the day of sale or upon the ratification thereof by the court, the balance in two equal payments at six and twelve months from the day of sale and to be secured by the bonds of the purchaser with sureties to be approved by the trustee.

2 4t DANIEL ANNAN, Trustee.

His Little Scheme.

By ALICE LOUISE LEE.

Copyright, 1906, by Alice Louise Lee.

CLAUDIA TEN EYCK was driving along the boulevard alone, her fluffy little head full of ideas of economy, which she was endeavoring to exercise for the benefit of Tennyson Benham, pedestrian, swinging rapidly down the bicycle path ahead of her.

"Oh, Tenny!" she called softly, drawing the mare up under the trees which separated the path from the highway. "I was just wishing"— Her voice did not finish the remark, but an engaging display of dimples did as she patted the seat beside her.

"It would be lovely," returned Tennyson morosely, "if it were my trap or my horse."

Claudia added a laugh to the dimples as the morose one climbed into the trap. "It will all come some day," she continued, laughing gayly.

"It's no laughing matter, Claudia," groaned Tennyson. "Here I am possessed of a law education which is rusting for lack of use, a few debts, fewer dollars and no prospects"—

"Tenny!" reproachfully.

"Only the doleful prospect of having to wait eternally for the dearest, sweetest, daintiest"—

Claudia blushed and hastened to interrupt. "I think the law is tiresome. Papa sits in his library all day, and I don't see why he should insist on your working."

Again Tennyson groaned at her viewpoint. The pater Ten Eyck, being confined to the house with the gout, did sit in his library all day, but he sat between a telephone and a stenographer, with a clerk in the background and a messenger boy or two at his command.

Soon the trap left the boulevard and plunged down the steep Mount Hope road into a narrow valley. At the foot of the mountain the highway broke up into a number of rude tracks traversing the valley. Into one of these Claudia turned the mare. "I want to see what is on the other side of that," she explained, pointing to a shoulder of the mountain around which the road curved.

In a moment her longings were gratified. They rounded the corner and came on a little cabin surrounded by pigs, chickens and children. A man with a gun stepped from the doorway and motioned them to stop.

"You git back thar," came his determined command. "I'll have you understand that this 'ere is private property, and there ain't goin' to be no trespassin' while I can handle a gun."

"How much do you charge per trespass?" inquired Tennyson gravely.

"I charge more'n you've been willin' to pay so far."

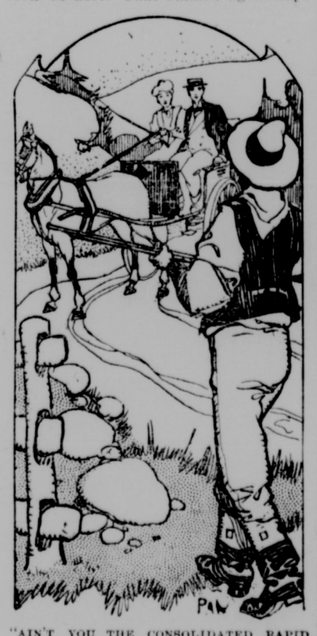
"So far," echoed Tennyson.

"Ain't you the Consolidated Suburban Rapid Transit company?" demanded the man suspiciously.

"My good sir," ejaculated Tennyson, "I am not consolidated nor even united—yet."

Claudia's dimples began to play, and she looked hard down the valley.

The man came nearer and rested one foot on the hub of a front wheel. "Say!" he broke out suddenly. "Mister, look 'ee here. That blamed agent says



"AIN'T YOU THE CONSOLIDATED RAPID TRANSIT COMPANY?"

he can take my land whether or no. He says he can come right through my pigpen over there, and I can't stop him. Can he?"

"My first client," murmured Tennyson in Claudia's ear. Then he turned to the man. "I'm afraid that agent is telling the truth," he began. Suddenly he paused and looked around. "What part of your land do they want to run the track through?"

The man dropped his gun and pointed. "He says they'll come right through Morrison's dugout yander and down this side of the valley where the grade is easy and smack through my pigpen—plague take their hides! I'll shoot 'em unless they put me up another pen"—

Tennyson interrupted. "How much land do you own here?"

The man jerked his thumb over his shoulder, "Jest that narrer strip acrost there between them wires."

Tennyson's eyes roved round the narrow farm meditatively. "Why not sell your entire farm? As it is the reed will cut it up badly."

The man pushed his hat back and scratched his head. "Guess I know that. But who'd want to buy the hull thing except such another blame fool as I was when I bought?"

There was a suppressed excitement in Tennyson's manner which aroused Claudia's curiosity. He took the reins from her hands and turned the mare about carefully. "I'll be back here in three hours or less to talk business to you," he said briefly, and after a few moments' silent climb the mare was trotting along the boulevard again toward Scranton.

"How mean of the law to go through a man's pigpen!" cried Claudia. "Can it go anywhere?"

Tennyson gave a preoccupied laugh. "Yes, under the laws of Pennsylvania all kinds of property—with one exception—can be condemned."

"Condemned," puzzled Claudia. "What does that mean?"

Tennyson explained, watching with delight the wise little wrinkle that appeared between the blue eyes and knowing that twenty-four hours would efface all recollection of the rights of eminent domain.

But for once he was mistaken. The responsibilities of life were weighing heavily on Claudia, and certain resolutions to understand more of economy and of law were becoming fixed. She had forgotten to ask Tennyson what one kind of property was exempt from condemnation, but there was her father.

"Now, papa, I want to know something," she began, planting her dimpled elbow on the table as they sat at dinner.

"I never got to the table yet but what you bothered me with your fool questions," grumbled Peter Ten Eyck.

Claudia, oblivious of the acidity in his tone, prefaced her question with "Papa, what kind of property can't the law go through?"

"The devil!" ejaculated Peter. "What are you talking about?"

She proceeded to elucidate. "Now just suppose a transit company or something wanted to go through a man's pigpen"— Peter stared hard. "Well, you know they can. But there's one kind of land they can't. What is it?"

"You're enough to turn a lawyer's hair white," said her father after a pause. "Probably you mean a cemetery." Then he gave her a shrewd look and said nothing more until they had finished dinner, when he asked abruptly, "Who were you driving with this morning?"

Claudia raised her brows inquiringly, tapping her cheek thoughtfully with a forefinger, she responded unblushingly: "Let me see. Was his hair black or brown?"

Ten Eyck grinned despite himself. "Brown."

"Oh, yes!" with an effort of the memory. "Then it was Ten—Mr. Benham."

"So I suspected—that nefarious little popinjay of a lawyer without any practice who is trying to marry money"—

"No, he isn't, papa," responded Claudia serenely, "for he refuses to marry me—that is, right away!" And she ran away, laughing mischievously.

That very evening Tennyson called. He was in high spirits. "Behold me!" he said, with a mock heroic bow. "At last I am on the highroad to fame and fortune. I am a real estate owner."

"Really, Tenny," excitedly. "Enough to build our house on?"

Tennyson threw his head back and broke into a peal of boyish laughter. "There's a house on it already and a pigpen too. I own the land formerly owned by the man with the gun."

Claudia's eyes grew large and round. "You've bought that horrid, desolate looking place. What for?"

"Don't tell me, dear, that you wouldn't like to live there!"

"Tenny!" she expostulated, but Tennyson evaded all further questions about his purchase. "Wait until I've struck it rich on my real estate, dear, and I'll tell you all about it."

With that he supposed his fiancee was content, but she was not. After his departure she repaired promptly to the source of wisdom.

"Papa, what is there down in the Mount Hope valley to bring money? Just supposing you had bought the land of that man with the pigpen down there, what should you expect to get out of it?"

The clerk and stenographer exchanged glances. Peter's brows contracted as he snorted. "The knowledge that I was a fool probably," and Claudia, sadder, but no wiser, retired.

Perhaps much learning with no outlet for it was making Tennyson insane, she reflected, and her theory was strengthened on the next occasion of their meeting, which was on Lackawanna avenue.

Tennyson's face was aglow with excitement. His spirits, so often at zero, were near the boiling point. He was ready to discuss their future, the probabilities of boarding Ten Eyck soon in his library and of the renting of a suitable home. So far Claudia's theory was discredited. But presently they passed a basement laundry out of which a Hungarian shuffled, making signs to Tennyson.

"Will you walk on slowly, Claudia? I won't be here but a moment," said the latter hurriedly, and Claudia did as he requested.

In a moment he had rejoined her, his face beaming. "At last I've secured one," he exclaimed.

"What?" asked Claudia curiously.

"A corpse!" was the astounding response, at which Claudia stopped short and gasped, too amazed for speech.

A spice of mischief crept into Tennyson's voice and shone in his eyes as he continued: "And it came dirt cheap too. I've got $5 left to conduct the funeral. Oh, I tell you, Claudia, I'll make it yet!"

"Make what?" breathed Claudia in a horrified whisper.

"That's a secret, a dead secret," was the prompt rejoinder.

"I can keep a secret."

"Of course you can, dear." Then ungallantly, "But so can I."

And he thought he was keeping it. So also thought Claudia and was deeply grieved over it.

A note from Tennyson the next day, however, alleviated her grief, but aroused her curiosity. "Dearest," it ran, "I know I ought not to give you an inkling of the truth and not tell it all, but when it can be told you will understand why I must keep my secret."

THEY FOUND HIM BESIDE HIS TABLE.

Claudia had never read a note of his where anticipation so bubbled over between the lines. Therefore she was unprepared for his appearance when several days later he walked into the music room. His face was tragic—with real tragedy this time. He did not even kiss her. Instead he folded his arms and began with a little catch in his voice: "Claudia, I've come to give you your freedom. I'm a penniless wreck."

"Tenny!" cried Claudia. The tears filled her big blue eyes. She stood before him and touched his arm wistfully, but it did not draw her closer. "I don't want it—my freedom, I mean! I won't take it! Whatever has happened?"

Tennyson looked away. "A good thing has just slipped through my fingers—unexpectedly slipped through. Now, so long as there's no further need for secrecy I'll explain"—

But he didn't, being interrupted by a call from the library. Peter Ten Eyck wished to see both Benham and his daughter at once.

They found him beside his table, his gouty foot on a cushion.

"Good day, sir," he said briskly, shaking Benham's hand cordially.

Claudia, regarding her father's pleasantry apprehensively, sat down on a sofa facing him. Peter motioned Tennyson to a place beside her.

"I've called you in here," Ten Eyck then began, "to ask a favor of you. But, as a preface, I'll relate a bit of your personal history which has come to my ears."

Claudia started, and Tennyson's hand moved nearer hers in spite of the fact that he had just heroically given her up.

"Personal business history, Mr. Benham," he amended dryly.

But at the next sentence Tennyson's back straightened with a sudden jerk.

"Mr. Benham, you are the young man who combined wit enough and law enough to buy up a strip of land in Mount Hope valley lying across the prospective route of the Consolidated Suburban Rapid Transit company."

Tennyson gasped.

"Then you proceeded, warily, as you thought, to get a Hungarian to bury his brother on your land. At the same time you applied for a charter incorporating the Mount Hope Cemetery company."

"How did you find out, and why did you find out?" interposed Tennyson.

Then Ten Eyck almost smiled. "As to the 'how,' you'll never know. As to the 'why,' it was very much to my interest to know, since I am—well, to all intents and purposes, as will soon be known, the Consolidated Suburban Rapid Transit company."

Tennyson's mouth opened, but no sound came.

"If I hadn't found out just as I did, young man, and stopped your game I suppose you'd have bled the Transit company a round number of thousands for the privilege of going through your cemetery, eh?"

Tennyson moistened his lips. "That was my intention."

"Now," began Peter, rubbing his forehead violently, "so much for the past. The favor I want to ask of you is this: Will you accept the position as counsel to the Consolidated?"

A light broke over Tennyson's face. "Will I?" he exclaimed. "I should be most happy to serve you, sir," he finished perfunctorily.

Peter rubbed his forehead again. His voice was sly. "I didn't know," he began, "but that you had a return favor to ask me," and he glanced meaningly at Claudia.

"Papa!" cried Claudia, pink to the tips of her little ears. She threw her arms about his neck, impulsively kissed his bald head, and fled.

"Better not run chances of losing in that game, young man," she heard her father say dryly, and a moment later Tennyson joined her in the music room.

How He Was Fooled by An Alleged Deaf Mute

NOW, I'm not deaf or dumb and can speak as good as any man. I attended a social dance of the deaf mutes some time ago. I do not speak the deaf and dumb language, as one of my hands is slightly incapacitated. I felt somewhat out of place and therefore was playing the part of wallflower. Not knowing how to ask for a dance, I had to watch my points. I soon got wise. When the next dance came around I got up and went over and asked the girl that sat opposite me (who also looked lonely) by making a circular gesture and pointing to her and myself. She gave her assent by bowing her head. Thinking that she was dumb, I did not have a word to say all during that dance, but at the end of the dance I got nervous and went through the necessary motions again, asking her for the next dance. She answered yes by nodding her head. I sat near her, and when the musicians were getting ready to play for the next dance a young man ran up to my girl and said:

"Say, Mag, kin I have der next dance?"

"Mag answered, pointing to me:

"No, Jim; I promised it to that dummy over there."—Judge's Magazine of Fun.

Failed to Please.

His eyes make no attempt to conceal his admiration of the beautiful young thing as she enters the parlor.

Indeed, he does not want them to.

"You are positively queenly," he declares enthusiastically.

An offended expression comes to her face.

"Queenly?" she asks disdainfully.

"Yes; you are a veritable queen in appearance."

Haughtily she bids him leave.

"But why?" he inquires, amazed.

"Oh, nothing. I'm a queen in appearance, am I? Well, I happened to look over a lot of magazine pictures of different queens and princesses today, and if you think I look like them it's time for you and me to be strangers."—New York Life.

Described.

It had been a strenuous afternoon for the devoted teacher who took six of her pupils through the Museum of Natural History, but her charges had enjoyed every minute of the time.

"Where have you been, boys?" asked the father of two of the party that night, and the answer came with joyous promptness, "We've been to a dead circus."—Boston Transcript.

Everything In Its Place.

"I suppose," said the young man who is studying politics, "that I ought to give some thought to political economy."

"What for?" rejoined Senator Sorghum. "Political economy's all right for a lecture in a parlor, but it's no good on the stump."—Washington Star.

The Tremolo Stop.

You kin talk about grand op'ry and of music that's top notch,
But our organ seems to hit me like a bagpipe hits the Scotch,
And I'll back our little player 'gainst the best in Conried's show
When he plays some old time hymn tunes and pulls out the tremolo.

The organ ain't a wonder, and its wind sometimes gives out;
The pumper is Dave Jordan, who's a shif'less, lazy lout,
But when on "Rock of Ages" the player lets her go
You can feel your soul a-heavin' on the waves of tremolo.

Ed Wilson tries to get it on that violin of his;
Our sopranner's aped the organ till we call her Quav'rin' Liz,
But there's no one grips your heartstrings in a clutch that won't let go
Like our little organ player when he pulls the tremolo.

Japan and America Will Fight Some Day.

By United States Senator GEORGE C. PERKINS of California.

THE science of war supervenes only upon a foundation of ALL OTHER SCIENCES. No nation in all history has ever manifested a greater capacity for perfect unity of purpose than the Japanese. No nation has manifested a greater aptitude to seize upon AND APPROPRIATE all that the ages have disclosed to the other nations in art, in science and in government.

The Japanese race, wherever distributed, however numerically strong in any foreign country, will remain a CONSOLIDATED UNIT in support of the aspirations of the Japanese race, and however distant their residence from the throne of the mikado will still constitute an element of strength in the unity of the empire.

NATURALIZATION IN ANY COUNTRY IN WHICH THEY MIGRATE WILL NOT ELIMINATE THIS RACIAL INSTINCT.

Conflicts between nations are the result of antagonisms which lie at the very foundation of their purposes, their aspirations, their growth AND EXPANSION. The presence of Russia as a prime factor in the commerce of the Pacific coast was inimical to the aspirations of the Japanese empire in the same line. The occupation of Manchuria and the fortification of Port Arthur were the IMMEDIATE EXCUSES, but not the real causes of the war. The real cause of the war was the inherent antagonism of interest and purpose which could find NO OTHER SOLUTION than the arbitrament of the sword.

We have acquired territory in the Pacific ocean. We have laid the foundation for commercial primacy on that great sea. We have a position at the very doors of the orient by the possession of the Philippines and a base of naval operations in the middle of the ocean by the incorporation of the Sandwich Islands. We have a shore line under the jurisdiction of the American flag which, following its indentations on the Pacific ocean borders of the Pacific states and the territory of Alaska, comprises 25,000 miles. The countries under the jurisdiction of our flag lying behind this line possess resources equal to the ULTIMATE SUPPORT OF EMPIRES of wealth and population. We have laid the foundation for commercial supremacy on the Pacific coast, and at some point in the future course of national destiny the pathway of national progress on the part of Japan and the United States will converge to a point of INEVITABLE CONFLICT.

It is useless to speculate as to what the occasion or excuse for this conflict may be. The small cloud of war which is now hanging on the horizon of the two nations appears to relate to the dissatisfaction of Japan with the domestic policy of the state of California relating to its educational interests. The administration of the educational affairs of California has not been fortunate in meeting with the approval of the empire of Japan, but this educational policy is not the reason for disturbing the amicable relations between the two nations.

THE FUNDAMENTAL CAUSE LIES AT THE VERY FOUNDATION OF THE NATIONAL CHARACTER OF THE NATIONS TO THE CONTROVERSY.

A Bonded Zone For Export.

By LESLIE M. SHAW, Secretary of the United States Treasury.

SUPPOSE instead of a bonded factory, we bond a well defined section of land containing, if you please, several thousand acres. Within this bonded territory all kinds of factories could be built and into this zone all kinds of raw material could be entered WITHOUT THE PAYMENT OF DUTY. This port should, of course, contain no dwellings. I would allow free coal and every other element of manufacture EXCEPTING LABOR to be entered free.

In other words, this free port should be a great consumer of American labor, the product of which, under the most encouraging conditions, should be for export AND FOR EXPORT ONLY. If it was removed from the port for the purpose of DOMESTIC consumption it should pay the same duty as if imported from abroad. I do not see wherein the American people could be harmed by such a policy, and it would result in furnishing employment to those who choose to live beneath our flag, consume our products and work AT THE AMERICAN SCALE OF WAGES.

All New England would be benefited by such a port somewhere on the north Atlantic coast. A similar port should be established in the vicinity of Norfolk and another on the gulf.

It will take time to develop the thought, but it is in absolute harmony with the present bonded warehouse, bonded factory and drawback policy, and we have the example in the free ports of Germany.

Women Favor Monogamy.

By Mrs. JOHN H. JUDGE, President of the Society For Political Study.

I DO not believe that men regard their wives as CHATTELS, as Professor William I. Thomas of Chicago university in his new book, "Sex and Society," would have us believe. Men who are successful in business are the ones who consult their wives and mothers. They know that women have brains. I do not consider the intellectual woman, the one who has simply acquired BOOK LEARNING. The intellectual woman of today is the one who has studied the problems of life with common sense and who has equipped herself with a FUNDAMENTAL EDUCATION that gives her a broad view.

As to the disadvantages of monogamy which the professor is pleased to point out, it may be true that what he calls ROMANCE wears off, but I do not think that our men of today lose their self interest so far as to seek out other women simply because they yearn for romance. Where such men are found it will be discovered that they are of the LOWEST MORAL TYPE.

THEY ARE THE MEN TO WHOM NOTHING APPEALS BUT THE GLITTER AND TINSEL, AND OUR REAL SOCIAL LIFE IS NOT MADE UP OF THAT.

When You Need Printing Done

You want it to be of the very best kind. As you expect your printed matter to make business it is necessary it should do the talking for you. Poor or indifferent printing cannot do this as it lacks the strong points required to gain and hold the interest of the patron.

¶ In this particular line of work we excel, for several reasons, viz: 1st; we have the largest and best variety of up-to-date type to be found in the western part of the state. 2nd; we carry only the very best grades of papers; and 3rd; the know-how with which to create original and attractive tye display.

¶ You make no mistake when you come to us with an order of printing

COL. B. F. BLUE SHOT HIMSELF

Suicide of the Postmaster at Grafton, W. Va., Who Had Failed of Reappointment.

Col. B. F. Blue, postmaster at Grafton, W. Va., committed suicide early yesterday morning at his home by shooting himself with a shotgun. He was a Union veteran and was aged past sixty years. Col. Blue was a widower and is survived by three sons. Recently Dr. Ernest Love was appointed postmaster to succeed Col. Blue but he was not confirmed. It is stated that Col. Blue brooded over not having been re-appointed but since his death it is reported that a letter addressed to him from Senator Elkins was received, telling him that he would be re-appointed. According to reports Col. Blue had been charged with withholding campaign documents in the postoffice just before the last election, and that he was continued in the office pending an investigation. No charge was brought affecting the finances of the office. He was well to do and was once a merchant at Grafton.

MRS. PENDLETON RECOVERS $5,500

Verdict of Jury in Suit Against Gillespie for Death of Husband.

The jury at Parsons, W. Va., Saturday in the suit of Mrs. Jack Pendleton for $10,000 damages for the death of her husband, brought in a verdict against C. D. Gillespie, of Brooklyn Heights, near Hendricks, for $5,500. Gillespie is reputed to be worth a quarter of a million dollars. He conducts a saloon at Brooklyn Heights, a town which he founded after he had been refused license at Hendricks just across the river. He built a new town, erected a bridge between it and Hendricks, had the town incorporated and had his friends elected to municipal offices and was speedily given license. Jack Pendleton was killed on the Otter Creek Railway in June last and Mrs. Pendleton contended that he was intoxicated at the time from liquor obtained from C. D. Gillespie's saloon at Brooklyn Heights. He was killed only a short distance from the saloon. Mrs. Pendleton contended that she notified Gillespie not to sell Pendleton any liquors, as provided by the statutes and as a result of his obtaining liquors there he failed to support her properly. The case was hard fought, Attorneys Scott and Herman appearing for the plaintiff and Shirley, Cunningham and Smith for the defendant. It enlisted unusual interest.

Gillespie will take the case to a higher court. He claims to have been in no sense responsible for Pendleton's death. The defense contended that Pendleton met death in some manner before he was run over by a train. His head was cut off, but very little blood was lost, it was claimed

Only a few days ago Mr. Gillespie was married to Mrs. Minnie May McNulty at Hendricks. He is interested in business enterprises in a dozen or more towns, owning bank stock and coal and timber lands. He is the largest stockholder in the new Hotel Gassaway at Elkins, one of the finest hostelries in West Virginia.

Narrow Escape from Serious Injury.

Mr. George D. Browning, of Swallow Falls, where he operates a saw mill, experienced a very narrow escape on last Thursday evening from very serious injuries. As it was he sustained a painful laceration of his left hand. Mr. Browning was engaged at work on his mill and in some manner a small piece of board or piece of timber became caught on a ring which he wore on his hand and this came in contact with the revolving saw. The ring was instantly stripped from his finger cleaving the flesh clear of the bone. Dr. Henry W. McComas attended Mr. Browning and dressed the injured finger.

Grand Opening, March 27 and 28.

We have endeavered to make our new store room something like a millinery show room should be. We take pleasure in inviting the public to view the result of our efforts.

FOR SALE

OR

FOR RENT

For Summer 1907

At Deer Park, Maryland, Main Line B. & O. R. R., to St. Louis, 2,500 Feet Above Tidewate, a Country Place of About 180 Acres.

"GLAMORGAN."

Thoroughly equipped as a farm and bounded by three county roads, insuring convenience and privacy. It is well adapted to public use, such as a Sanatorium or to private residences, five sites with beautiful views and appurtenant acres, being reached by its three miles of private pleasure drives through the woods.

The dwelling house was built from plans by Hewitt Bros., of Philadelphia. The plumbing is by Ogelsby, of the same city. It is in complete order, and is replete with the modern appliances of a gentleman's residence. It is within ten minutes' walk of the post office and railroad station and within one mile of the Deer Park Hotel. Its general plan is as follows:

Wide porches surround three faces terminated, on a level, with billiard room.

I. FIRST FLOOR.—Parlor, hall with main stair case, library, dining room and lavatory.

II. BACK BUILDING.—Stair case to cellar, in which are furnace, gas machine (supplied by outside gasometer), wine closet, pantry (hot and cold water), back stairs to second story back building. Laundry—3 stationary tubs, hot and cold water in each; ironing stove, flat house on reel and special boiler. Kitchen, with range, sink and all appliances. Back porch, ten feet from which is ice house practically inexhaustable in summer; servants' bath room, etc.

I. SECOND FLOOR.—Two communicating chambers, with bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; one chamber communicating with its bath room; total, four chambers with three bath rooms.

II. BACK BUILDING, 2nd FLOOR.—Four chambers, two closets, bath room with W. C. adjoining.

THIRD FLOOR.—Two chambers, two large lofts.

Every room has gas fixtures and eight rooms have open fire-places in addition to furnace register.

The water supply is unexceptionable, its every source being from springs rising within the confines of the place and all having passed analytical examination. Two tanks (each in contact with outside air) having a combined capacity of 14,500 gallons, a wind mill, a horse power and an overshot wheel supplying the motor. Three dams (likewise spring water) contribute the low supply and two of them are stocked with fish. The outbuildings are a barn with stalls for six horses and eight carriages, with ample storage for hay, straw and oats and having a coachman's room, a tenant's house of five rooms, a large cow and sheep stable and numerous sheds, etc.

This property is without encumbrance and possession can be given in May, 1907.

Apply to Owner, 1632 Walnut street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Farm for Sale.

Shack.

By FRANK H. SWEET.

Copyright, 1906, by Frank H. Sweet.

TWO black, eager faces bent suddenly forward as the dice—bones, they called them—rattled upon the low roof of Wung Sin's laundry. As the tiny cubes tumbled over and over, deciding the ownership of the two coins which lay between the youthful gamblers, the "shooter" cried fervently:

"Come seben! Dis fo' a paih o' shoes!"

To which the other, to counteract the spell of the conjure invoked, responded with equal fervor:

"Call him off, seben! Dat my breakfas'," at the same time reaching hopefully toward the coins.

But the shooter forestalled him—for the dice had now stopped—and declared the money his.

He picked up the coins and ostentatiously tossed one back upon the roof, calling:

"Fade me, Cuffy!"

Cuffy faded him by searching long and laboriously through his clothing for another coin, which he at length found and placed beside the one on the roof. Then the shooter picked up the dice and juggled them in the hollow of his hands, blowing upon his fingers for luck. When they rattled back to the roof the two faces again bent lower, one fearfully, the other exultantly and jeering.

"Yo's, Shack." And the one called Cuffy rose to his feet with ashy face. "I's 'bleege to stop now, nigger. I's done out."

Shack looked at him curiously, standing on the defensive. Indeed, there was usually good reason for Shack's customary defensive attitude at the end of a game of craps. He had been accused of ringing in "peeties"—loaded dice—of overawing a weak opponent by a blustering demeanor, of doing many things that were considered disreputable among roustabouts. But, however lawless he might be or mean, he never showed any signs of it outwardly. His eyes had a keen, straightforward way of searching other eyes, his shoulders remained square, his head was carried high.

As he stood there on the defensive, waiting for Cuffy to pitch into him as other worsted crap shooters had done, he first wondered, then grew derisive at the larger boy's peaceable, almost pitiable attitude.

"Skeered?" he mocked.

"No, I ain't skeered," answered Cuffy quickly, "but what for I fight yo'?

"COME SEBEN! DIS FO' A PAIH O' SHOES!"

Dar ain' nobody to blame but me. I—I done stole dat money, an' I promise mammy I nebber shoot craps in all de worl'. I ain'—no—good any mo'," his lips beginning to quiver.

Shack grinned.

"Yo' ain' de firs' pusson dat stole," he jeered. "I reckon yo' better go on in de dark an' hide. Den de p'lice ain' cotch yo'. Now lemme see yo' cry."

Cuffy paid no attention to him.

"An' my mammy trusted me," he went on dolefully, "an' was a-savin' up for me to go to Tuskegee an' learn a heap o' t'ings, an' den I was a-goin' to make money an' buy her a house wid a plazzer like w'ite fo'ks an' a mule an' cow an' some chickens, an' now—oh, mammy!"

"Dat's right," cried Shack encouragingly. "I see dem tears a-comin'. Cuffy. Let 'em drap, nigger; let 'em drap!"

A moment [illegible] dried the incipient tears, [illegible] grew tense. The [illegible] stopped.

"I ain't [illegible] without [illegible] you like I [illegible] whup [illegible] pound till [illegible] 'erstan'. [illegible] savin' for [illegible] savin' to [illegible] widout need. [illegible] a whole dollar shootin' craps all I earn dis week—an' I promise mammy I nebber shoot craps in de worl'. I wish yo'd whup me good, Shack."

But Shack was not fighting on that line. He threw his arms akimbo and regarded Cuffy with critical amusement.

"So yo's a mammy boy," he sneered, "an' a schoolin' boy! Wha's yo' sense, Cuffy? A mammy's good 'nough for babies, but we's too big. I nebber had no mammy, an' I'm tough. Yo' better widout one. Dey spiles big boys."

"Yo' ain't know my mammy," was Cuffy's answer, "an' yo' ain't keer for schoolin'. 'Cep'n' for dat yo'd be t'ink in' like me." Then a sudden inspiration seized him, and he added, "Wha yo' stay tonight, Shack?"

"Don' know," indifferently. "roun' some'er's. Mebbe in ole Brown's lumber yard if de watchman don' ketch me."

"Den s'pose yo' come on home 'long o' me an' see my mammy," invited Cuffy eagerly. "She make yo' t'ink like me, shore. We hab watermilyun an' sweet taters an' bacon, an' in de mawnin' mammy likely gib us fried chicken. Yo' can sleep 'long o' me in my baid. Wha yo' say?"

Shack did not say anything for fully two minutes. The question was a weighty one. At first his impulse was a flat refusal, but the thought of meeting Cuffy's mammy and being able to ridicule that obstinate boy in the intrenchments of his own home was a pleasant one. And then the "watermilyun an' sweet taters" and the possibility of fried chicken! They decided him.

"I's yo' cake," he grinned.

The two boys walked cautiously to the edge of Wung Sin's laundry roof and peered down. Crap shooting was a serious offense, and Shack was careful to keep this retreat on the laundry roof from the knowledge of the police.

"See anyt'ing, Cuffy?" he whispered as they glanced sharply from side to side.

"Only dat fruit seller on de corner. He ain' min'."

Grasping the edge of the roof with their hands, they swung over and dropped lightly to the ground. Then they scurried round the corner into Bay street and were lost in the crowd.

Cuffy's mother lived in a small tenement in the colored district. She was ironing when the boys arrived.

"Dat yo', Cuffy?" she called as they darkened the [illegible] way. "Come right in, honey. An' who's yo' frien'?"

"Him Shack, mammy," answered Cuffy rather proudly. "Yo' done heah me tole 'bout him."

"Co'se I has, honey, co'se I has," the woman exclaimed, leaving her ironing and coming forward cordially. "Glad to see yo', Shack. Come right in, boy. I done heah 'bout yo' heaps o' times. Sit down in dat rockin' cheer. Dar, dat's right. So yo's Shack. Law, law! My boy's done tole 'bout yo' no end. Say yo's able do anyt'ing yo' set out for; dat yo's de mos' promisin' black boy in de whole city." She returned to her ironing and worked vigorously for several minutes, then: "Does yo' know, honey, dat's a mighty fine say-so? De mos' promisin' boy! Dat means dar's gran' wuk befo' yo'—gran' wuk, honey. We black fo'ks need jes' sech boys to grow up an' lead us. I's glad you an' Cuffy am frien's. He's a good boy, but easy led. He needs strong, true frien's to show de way. Wha's dat, Cuffy? Shack goin' stay all night? Shore 'nough? Law, law! Dat's good! Now yo' boys jes' placate 'mong yo'se'fs while I get dis ironin' off; den we's hab supper an' mo' talk. Cuffy, yo' put dat milyun in a pail o' col' water."

Shack had listened without any attempt to answer, but his eyes and ears were keenly alert. This was an experience which was entirely new and which it would take him time to adjust. He had peered into rooms before now and had generally been driven away with a broom or poker, but he did not remember any of them that had been quite so clean and cozy as this scantily furnished room, and certainly none of the women had been like this one who was actually treating him as though his presence was desirable. But of course he was right in his declaration that a mammy was a detriment to a big boy. This was only an unusual side he was seeing; presently would appear some weakness with which he could overwhelm Cuffy.

But what appeared presently brought him half to his feet in sudden wonder, derision, contempt. There was Cuffy actually telling his mammy about the crap shooting and the money he had lost, and more wonderful yet, instead of scolding and punishing him as ordinary women would have done, this mammy was patting her boy's cheeks and talking in a low, earnest voice, and, yes, they were both crying.

Shack drew a hard, deep breath and waited in momentary expectation of hearing his own name. But, no, Cuffy only spoke of himself and then went back to his chair by the window, where he sat very sober and thoughtful. And his mammy began to put away her ironing and prepare for supper.

After supper Shack returned to the rocking chair, feeling very comfortable and contented. And the puzzling mammy, after she had cleared the table and washed the dishes, came and sat down between him and Cuffy.

"Co'se yo' goin' to Tuskegee when yo' get able, honey," she began, and then, accepting this for a fact and unobservant of the indignant scorn on his face, she went on in an almost reverent voice: "Hit's a gran' t'ing, dis school; a gran', noble t'ing. W'at we black fo'ks lak is knowin' t'ings, an' dis school will gib us dat, heapin' up an' runnin' ober. Yo' boys dat projec' for schoolin' can be mos' anyt'ing yo' aim for—preachers, doctors, lawyers, railroaders—jes' lak w'ite fo'ks. Hit's a gran' t'ing to be a strong boy like yo', wid all dese t'ings on ahead." Her hand sought Shack's shoulder and rested there caressingly. "Some day, honey," she continued gently, "yo'll likely be ridin' in yo' own kerridge an' he'pin' all de black fo'ks round' yo'. I hope yo'll sort o' look out for Cuffy. He's a good boy, but jes' a little weak sometimes. When yo'se bofe at Tuskegee don' let him shoot craps an' t'ings like dat. He'll heah to yo'. Promis' yo'll keer for him, honey."

Again Shack's breath came hard, but her hand was upon his shoulder, her eyes lookin' into his. He tried to scoff and jeer, but the words stuck in his throat, and only a husky "Yes'm, I will," came to his lips. Then he rose suddenly to his feet, only to sink back into the chair, hot and trembling, for this strange mammy had kissed him.

"I knowed yo' would, honey," she said softly, "but I wanted to heah yo' promise. A boy lak yo' nebber forgets his promise."

Shack made a desperate effort to break from the spell that was closing in upon him. Missionaries he did not mind, but this mammy was approaching him in an unrecognized way. If he wished to humiliate Cuffy he must keep better control of himself. But he only said:

"School like dat cos' a heap."

"No, honey; hit's made for pore fo'ks like we all. Me an' Cuffy 'low on gettin' a hun'ered dollars, den I'll be sen'in' what I can to him. I reckon yo' could sabe dat much quicker'n we hab. Cuffy says yo' make heaps o' money."

For want of a better answer Shack nodded. He thought of the $7 or $8 he often made in a single week by shooting craps. But her next words chilled him:

"WHO'S A NIGGER?" HE DEMANDED.

"I's glad yo' ain't shoot craps, honey."

"How yo' know?" he demanded sharply.

"By yo' eyes an' de way yo' walks," she answered, smiling. "Fo'ks ain' shoot craps an' do mean t'ings when dey walk an' look like yo'. I know. Dat's why I make yo' promise to keer for Cuffy. Law, law! Shakin' yo' head ain' fool me. Crap shootin's a mean, low t'ing, an' I's mighty glad yo' ain' do hit."

Shack's eyes fell gradually to the floor. In imagination he could see Cuffy over by the window regarding him curiously and these other eyes looking at him with frank confidence. He tried to raise his gaze to theirs, but could not. What did it mean? He had never felt timid or abashed before.

When he went into the loft with Cuffy he was thinking very hard and very shrewdly. He had never been in a real bed before, and the softness felt deliciously soothing, but for all that he did not fall asleep. He listened to Cuffy's regular breathing and thought and struggled and understood rebelliously that he was being conquered, but he was straightforward and sharp with himself, even though it hurt. And at length he heard this strange, tender voiced mammy beginning to move below.

When he went down he accompanied Cuffy to a corner behind a large storehouse to gather kindlings. There he made a last desperate effort to assert himself.

Placing a chip upon his shoulder, he turned fiercely to his companion.

"Who's a nigger?" he demanded.

Cuffy laughed in his face.

"I reckon we bofe is," he grinned. "But wha' for yo' act so, Shack? I ain' goin' knock no chip offen yo' shoulder. We ain' no need fight. We's goin' to Tuskegee, me an' you is. Yo' done tole mammy so."

"I done tole yo' is skeered to fight," yelled Shack. "Didn't yo' say I's nigger when I crap yo' out yes'day? Now knock dis chip off an' prove hit."

"Mebbe I call yo' nigger," retorted Cuffy placidly. "I know yo' did me, plenty time. Dat ain' nuffin. I ain' goin' fight, an' yo' ain' goin' fight. We's got better sense. But dar's mammy callin' us to breakfas'. Come, Shack!"

The chip fell unheeded from Shack's shoulder. But he was not a boy to do things by halves. As they went toward the house he slipped the dollar he had won into Cuffy's pocket.

"Tell yo' mammy yo' met de crap shooter an' he gib hit back," he said. "An' if she eber ax yo' does I shoot craps, yo' say no, I done gib hit up, an' I has. I's goin' take dat job the steamboat man offer at fo' dollar. 'Tain' much, but mebbe I make more by wukin' hard. I's goin' long o' yo' to Tuskegee, sure 'nough."

Saxe and Holmes.

The poet John G. Saxe and Oliver Wendell Holmes were talking about brain fever, when Mr. Saxe remarked, "I once had a severe attack of brain fever myself." "How could you have brain fever?" asked Dr. Holmes, smiling; "it is only strong brains that have brain fever." "How did you find that out?" asked Saxe.

ANOTHER PROMINENT CITIZEN IS GONE.

Mr. Wm. A. Brydon Passes Away at His Home at Bloomington.

Mr. William A. Brydon, aged 69 years, for many years prominent and active in the affairs of Allegany and Garrett counties, and a well known coal operator of this section, died yesterday afternoon at 3 o'clock at his residence, "Borderside," Bloomington, Garrett county, Md., death resulting from a complication of diseases coupled with old age.

In his younger days he was active politically and before the division of old Allegany county into Allegany and Garrett counties, represented the old county in the Maryland legislature, in 1867. He also served the old Allegany county school board, and later served several terms on the Garrett county school board.

Under two administrations, Presidents Cleveland and McKinley, he served eight years as chief bookkeeper in the sub-treasury at Baltimore. He was connected some time with the old Hampshire and Baltimore Coal Company, operating near his home place, and later with the North Branch Coal Company. He retired from active life about five years ago and has since resided at the home place.

He is survived by his wife, formerly Miss Susie Virginia Brady, daughter of the late Samuel Brady, of Allegany county, and the following children: John C. Brydon, Cumberland, general manager of the Davis Coal & Coke Company, who was in Florida, but is now on his way home; William S. Brydon, manager of the Brydon Coal Companies, Grafton, W. Va.; L. B. Brydon, of the L. B. Brydon Coal Company, Grafton; S. B. Brydon, superintendent of the Blaine Mining Company, Blaine, W. Va.; E. R. Brydon, mining engineer with the Somerset Coal Company, Somerset, Pa., Howard P. Brydon and Miss Edna Brydon, at home. He also leaves one surviving brother, Mr. Edward R. Brydon, of Baltimore, retired, formerly connected with the Baltimore police department. The funeral arrangements have not yet been made.

Public Sale of Personal Property.

I will offer at public auction at my home near Deer Park an April 6th, beginning at ten o'clock a. m., several head of cows, household goods, grain, hay, chickens, seed oats, farming implements and many other articles too numerous to mention. Terms of sale will be made known on day of sale.

4-2t. HOWARD W. SMOUSE.

Lewis Broderick, who is holding a position with the Erie Railroad, arrived home this morning for a few days' stay.

DEATH OF BARNEY DURNAN.

Demise of Man Injured by B. & O. Train In Oakland.

Barney Durnan, who was injured by a Baltimore and Ohio train after he had fallen into the cut between Second street and the water station in Oakland on Saturday night, March the 16th, where he was later found and conveyed to the hospital ward in the County Jail, succumbed to his injuries last Saturday morning, never having fully regained consciousness.

At the time of his death there was at his bedside his brother, who lives at Steelton, Pa., who had been communicated with by the county officials, informing him of the injuries received by his relative.

The remains of the deceased were interred in the Catholic cemetery in Oakland on last Sunday morning.

Besides his brother the deceased is survived by his mother, who is quite aged and resides at Steelton, Pa.

BITTINGER.

Sunny days and lazy ways,
Signs of spring unerring;
The same old hoax the women folks,
With soap and brush are rearing.

P. Young Lohr, of Oakland, was shaking hands with old friends in this village last Saturday evening.

Mr. Daniel Beitzell and Miss Annie Schrock, two esteemed young people of Amish settlement just west of this place, were married last Sunday morning at 11 o'clock. The ceremony took place in the Amish church and was attended by a large assembly of young and old.

Miss Malinda Orendorf, of Grantsville, spent last Sabbath with her parents at this place.

Rev. J. B. Shoup, who returned from a winter tour of Florida about two weeks ago, preached to the people here last Sunday. The service was held in the public school building on account of some repairing being in process on the church.

For the first time in her history Bittinger is to have the honor of entertaining one of the County Normal Schools. The school will be under the management of Prof. P. E. King, and as the hospitality of this village is well known we expect many young people to come and spend the term here and all will be cordially welcomed.

Asa Orendorf, was seen on our streets last Saturday and Sunday.

The sugar makers of this section "opened their camps" last week and a few gathered considerable quantities of water on Saturday, and we have already tasted of the first product of the season.

A Far Country: Easter Meditations.

BY REV. DAVIS W. CLARK, D.D.

China was an unreal place to me. I looked with small interest at the yellow splotch which represented it on the map. But one day a favorite niece of mine was on the point of sailing to China. I talked with her over the "long distance." I twitted her with the Oriental "slant" already, as I alleged, appearing in her eye. I heard her merry laugh and then over one thousand miles of charged wire came her "Good-by, Uncle!" and she was gone. And years must pass before I see her face again. Instantly China was real to me, and a place of absorbing interest. One of "my own" was there. She was treading the soil and breathing the air of the yellow Empire. Now, all books, pictures, persons that can tell me aught of China at once command my attention.

Heaven is like a far-away and unreal place to us, concerning which it is difficult to have lively interest. But let one of our own sail away to that distant country and instantly all is changed. Heaven ceases to be mythical. We have an absorbing desire to know what it is like, who are its inhabitants and what their occupations. This desire expresses itself in the lines:

"O talk to me of heaven. I love
To hear about my home above:
For there doth many a loved one dwell
In light and joy ineffable.
O tell me how they shine and sing,
While every harp rings echoing:
And every glad and tearless eye
Beams like the bright sun gloriously.
Tell me of that victorious palm
Each hand in glory beareth,
Tell me of that Celestial calm,
Each face in glory weareth."

The quest of beauty has been age-long. All the arts have sought it—but all say: "We have not attained." Heaven will be the realization of the ideal of beauty. Tradition says that St. Cecelia on hearing an angel choir—broke her instruments and dropped them on the ground. She stood entranced at the absolute perfections of melody to which she could only approximate. So at first vision of the perfection of heavenly beauty, it will be confessed that what man sought, God realized.

The occupation of heaven will be devotional, contemplative and active. Heaven is a temple—and worship is inseparable from a temple. John the Divine says: "I heard the voice of harpers and they sung a new song before the throne." Again, the capacity and facility for acquiring knowledge will remain—only greatly enlarged. But the heavenly life will not be merely devotional and contemplative. It will be active. There, as here, will be application of knowledge for definite ends.

It is a mistake to divorce the life in the world from the life in heaven. The mere experience of transition will have no effect upon character. It has been said the dead Hottentot knows more than the living Plato. But the Hottentot in heaven will acquire just as much as he has capacity for and no more. Our present duty is to enlarge our capacity. This we do by thought, worship, love and service.

A genuine rustic, when he comes to town, can do nothing but gape and stare. But there live in the country many people who are in tune with the city. By reading, conversation and thought they have come to know the city and its ways. They walk the streets as if they had always lived there. So it is possible to live in such tune with the Celestial City that we shall enter it as if it belonged to us and we were always its citizens.

"Since I am coming to that holy room,
Where with the choir of saints forevermore
I shall be made Thy music as I come
I tune the instrument here at the door,
And what I must do there, think here before."

LOST HIS THUMB.

Mr. Mahlon Glotfelty Injured In Accident at His Saw Mill.

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Mahlon Glotfelty, ex-County Treasurer of Garrett county, and prominent farmer and saw mill operator near McHenry, met with an accident whereby he lost the thumb of his right hand.

Mr. Glotfelty was beneath the mill in the saw dust pit removing the offal from the saw when the shovel he was using struck a piece of board, deflecting it from its course and throwing his hand upward when it was struck by the rapidly revolving saw with the result above stated.

Mr. Glotfelty is nearly seventy years of age and his physical condition is such that the administration of an anesthetic while his injury was being dressed was deemed inadivisable by his physician, Dr. Hinebaugh, of Oakland, but he stood the ordeal with remarkable courage.

THE DEATH RECORD.

FRANK CODDINGTON.

Died, at his home in Oakland on Sunday at the hour of noon, after an illness of eighteen hours of acute indigestion, Frank, eldest son of the late Thomas and Cecelia Coddington, aged 37 years. The deceased for the past few months has been in the employ of the Government as rural letter carrier on route No. 1 from the Oakland postoffice. He performed his duties as usual on Saturday, arriving home in the afternoon apparently in his usual health and was taken ill while engaged in doing some work about his premises. His sufferings were intense and death was a relief. He leaves besides his widow, who is a daughter of Mr. William Browning, four small children, two brothers and five sisters, a large number of relatives and many friends who sincerely regret his sudden death. The deceased was a member of the Catholic church in Oakland from which his funeral took place Tuesday morning after a Mass celebrated by Rev. Connell, with interment in the cemetery here. His family and friends have the sympathy of all in this their sad bereavement.

Orphans' Court Proceedings.

In the Orphans' Court for Garrett county in session Tuesday with Judges Wilson, McMillan and Feik present, the following business was transacted:

Letters of administration were granted Mrs. Emma F. Root upon the personal property of her late husband, Truman F. Root.

To T. O. King, letters of admistration were granted upon the personal estate of Sarah A. Durst.

The last will and testament of Ludwig Saussman, late of near Grantsville, was admitted to record and Peter Nathan qualified as executor.

RELIGIOUS, LITERARY AND SOCIAL SOCIETY OF OAKLAND

Having for Its Object the Spiritual Development of its Members Organized.

As the result of the earnest work of a few young men there has been organized in Oakland the Young Men's Religious, Literary and Social Society of Oakland with a membership exceeding forty, with well appointed rooms as the place of meeting in the Mitchell building on Second street where the second and third floors have been fitted up with good taste as reading and assembly rooms, the walls decorated with pictures and the nucleus of a library established.

The object of the society is to develop the spiritual, literary and social qualities of its members, seek out and lend a helping hand to those who are non-members of any church organization and establish such in some church home.

A well attended meeting of the members was held in the assembly room of the Society on last Saturday night when after transacting routine business the election of officers for the ensuing year was made, resulting in the following being chosen:

President, Rev. John A. McClelland; vice president, E. J. Fringer; secretary, Mr. Joseph E. Harned; treasurer, Dr. B. F. Selby, and collector, Mr Lee Mason.

An advisory board composed of three members was also elected composed of Rev. J. B. Workman, Rev. E. Manges and Mr. James A. Sincell, who were elected for the period of six, twelve and eighteen months respectively.

The committee appointed at a meeting previously held reported subscriptions amounting to $205 which funds will be used to pay any obligations incurred by the society in the furnishing of rooms, purchase of supplies, etc.

The rooms of the society will be open for the inspection of those interested in the success of the undertaking on Tuesday evening, April 2nd, when the next regular meeting of the Society will be held.

Levy Term.

By notice published elsewhere in this paper today the County Commissioners give notice of the meeting of the Board on Monday, April 15th, 1907, for the purpose of making the levy for the year 1907. All persons having claims against the county should file the same on or before the date set for making the levy.

Mrs. Thomas and three children, of Cumberland, are in Oakland visiting Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Beamer at their home on First street

MOUNTAIN LAKE PARK.

The Ladies' Aid Society of the M. E. church will give a social at the residence of Mrs. J. A. Hayden on Monday evening next, beginning at 8.30. Ice cream and cake will be served, and a pleasant social time will be enjoyed. All will be given a cordial welcome.

The ladies of the Baptist church will hold a festival on Tuesday evening next in the postoffice building here, for the benefit of the Baptist church building fund. One of the attractions will be a splendid male quartett—Messrs. Groves, Cuppett, Lowdermilk and Lewis. Refreshments will be served.

Superintendent Davis was at the Park Tuesday and Wednesday. Tuesday evening he attended prayer meeting and gave us a very helpful talk. Dr. Davis always says something when he talks.

Farming operations have been commenced by Mr. Chance who has charge of this department at the Park.

Among late improvements we note a new tin roof on the Chautauqua Hotel and on the old part of Maryland Home. The Messrs. Shirer, of Oakland, are doing the work.

Hipsley Bros. are painting the Davis cottage, on G street, which will be occupied by Dr. J. W. Laughlin and family about April 1st.

Easter services will be held in the M. E. church, Mt. Lake Park, Sunday at 10.30 a. m., and at the U. B. church, Loch Lynn, at 7.30 p. m.

Mrs. McKinney will occupy her cottage on D street April 2nd.

Mr. C. W. Hopkins, our active real estate agent, took a trip to near by western towns Monday, to meet parties with whom he has been in correspondence with reference to the rental and sale of several cottages in the Park.

Our friend C. M. Rathbun is happy He recently procured an appliance by which he can hear as well as any one. On last Sunday he heard his first sermon for years—and it was preached by his son Franklin.

Mr. John Close, who removed from this neighborhood with his family to Berkely Springs, W. Va., last fall, was among his many friends here this week. He reports his family well and satisfied with their present location.

A force of mechanics, in charge of Mr. Henry May, are at work on the new postoffice building. The building will be two stories high and 35 by 65 feet in size. The building will be completed by the opening of the season.

Had Quite an Experience.
